(2)Richland did locate evidence that at one time it possessed records regarding the Appellant's parents but that those records had been taken by DuPont, the contractor operating the DOE's Hanford facility at the time her parents were employed at Hanford, to a DuPont facility at Wilmington, Delaware. Richland provided the Appellant with information on how to contact DuPont to obtain those records. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Angela Ward, Richland Operations Office, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney, (January 31, 1997).

(3)In processing Appellant's request, Richland conducted its search as if the request had been made under the Freedom of Information Act, which encompasses a greater range of documents than the Privacy Act. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Yvonne Sherman, Richland, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (February 18, 1997).

(4)We note that the Privacy Act and the Freedom of Information Act apply only to agency documents and not to tissue samples in the possession of an agency. Nevertheless, we have been informed by an official at Richland that the only tissue samples of any kind that Richland possesses are a few samples from long-deceased individuals reduced to ash.

(5)We do not believe that the fact that employee health records were at one time created for the Appellant's parents would necessarily indicate that an employer created a medical record for an employee's child.

(6)We will also provide to DOE Headquarters under separate cover the additional information the Appellant provided in her Appeal.

March 19, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: J. Richard Quirk, Esquire

Date of Filing: February 4, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0266

On February 4, 1997, J. Richard Quirk, Esquire (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued to him on January 3, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Savannah River Operations Office (SR). In that determination, SR claimed that it did not possess any documents responsive to a request for information filed by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to conduct an additional search for responsive information.

I. BACKGROUND

On October 8, 1996, the Appellant submitted a request for information to the DOE seeking copies of: "All contracts, inspection reports and other records concerning the Four Soil Vapor Extractor Unit built by Brown Engineering, reference # AB 10150 C." Request at 1. On January 3, 1997, SR issued a determination in which it claimed that:

DOE's contract with Westinghouse Savannah River Company (WSRC) ... provides: ?The following records are considered the property of the Contractor and are not Government Documents ... Confidential Contractor financial information, and correspondence between the Contractor and other segments of the Contractor located away from the DOE facility; ....' The records you have requested are considered confidential contractor documents; and therefore, they are not Government records and not covered under the FOIA.

Determination Letter at 1. On February 4, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, challenging the SR's determination that it did not possess any responsive documents.

II. ANALYSIS

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). We review the adequacy of an agency's search under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

In the instant case, SR's determination suggests that documents responsive to the appellant's request exist, but are neither agency records nor subject to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). Accordingly, we must determine on appeal whether such records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). Moreover, we must determine whether any records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994).

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information required to be made available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-stage analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as a DOE contractor, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., B.M.F. Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA, and if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether an entity should be regarded as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case which involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham); see also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976). Documents are considered to be "agency records" if they were obtained by an agency and were within the agency's control at the time the FOIA request was made. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE FOIA regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

A. Whether the Scope of SR's Search for Responsive Documents was Appropriate

After reviewing the record, we found that SR's determination that all of the documents responsive to the Appellant's request were contractor records was not sufficiently supported in its determination letter. While it is quite possible that this determination is correct, it would have been unusual for a facility to be constructed on a DOE site without some records concerning the facility making their way into DOE's files. Accordingly, we contacted SR to ascertain the scope of its search for responsive documents. In response to our inquiry, SR has begun an additional search for responsive documents. This expanded search has already located and identified at least 4 responsive documents in the DOE's files. Accordingly, we are remanding this issue to SR for: (1) a continuation of this expanded search; and (2) determinations of the releasability of all responsive documents located by this search.

B. Whether any Responsive Documents Were the Property of the Government

A separate and distinct issue before us is whether all the records concerning the Four Soil Vapor Extractor Unit at the Savannah River Site are the property of WSRC. Applying the Orleans standard to the present case, we find that WSRC is clearly not an "agency" under the FOIA. Since WSRC is not an agency for the purpose of the FOIA, any documents that are the property of WSRC are not agency records. Nor are documents that are owned by a contractor, according to the terms of the contractual agreement between the contractor and the DOE, subject to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). Because the determination letter did not indicate the nature of the documents it found to be owned by WSRC, we contacted SR to obtain clarification on this issue from SR officials. As of this writing, WSRC officials are compiling an index of documents in its possession that concern the Four Soil Vapor Extractor Unit built by Brown Engineering. Accordingly, on remand, SR must review this index and determine whether any document identified in the index is the property of the government. Any such document should be reviewed for possible disclosure under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1).

III. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, we are remanding this matter to the Department of Energy's Savannah River Operations Office for completion of the expanded search for responsive documents and the issuance of a new determination letter. On remand, SR should: (1) determine whether each document listed in WSRC's index is the property of the government, (2) identify each document located by SR's expanded search, (3) indicate whether each document identified in steps (1) or (2) is released or withheld, and (4) clearly explain any withholdings of documents.

It is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by J. Richard Quirk, Esquire, on February 4, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0266) is hereby granted and remanded to the Savannah River Operations Office for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: James D. Hunsberger

Date of Filing: May 20, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0267

On May 20, 1997, James D. Hunsberger filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on December 30, 1996, by the Nevada Operations Office (Nevada) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned the remand of a prior Appeal Mr. Hunsberger filed with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) regarding a request for information that he had made pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Parts 1004 and 1008. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be required to conduct a further search for the information Mr. Hunsberger has requested.

I. Background

On December 12, 1995, Mr. Hunsberger submitted a request for information under the Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts to the Department of Energy. In that initial request he sought all information concerning human experiments of which he may have been a part. He specifically sought information about experiments that tested the effects of a broad range of specified types of radiation on human subjects. Other elements of his initial request are not at issue at the present appeal. The request was referred to the DOE's Office of Human Radiation Experiments (OHRE) for a response.

In a July 22, 1996 Determination Letter, the Acting Director of the OHRE stated that her staff had searched the documents available in the DOE's human radiation experimentation database and found no responsive documents. In addition, they looked into ongoing research involving humans and electric and magnetic fields (EMF), and provided Mr. Hunsberger with information about one project. Mr. Hunsberger appealed this determination, contending that the search was inadequate. In particular, he stated that his request was far broader than EMF studies. He also questioned the accuracy of several of the statements in the determination letter, especially those dealing with ongoing research.

In a September 20, 1996 Decision and Order, the OHA found that the OHRE's search was adequate, but that the search of the agency as a whole was inadequate. It found the search inadequate on the departmental level because although personal identifiers had been removed from the documents in the database that the OHRE had searched, the unredacted originals, which might possibly contain the names of subjects, are located at the Coordination and Information Center (CIC) in Nevada. The Nevada Operations Office, which is responsible for CIC, confirmed that the records can be searched by name. In addition, because it appeared from his request that Mr. Hunsberger may have been seeking information about experiments that were performed on prison populations, Nevada indicated that a search could be conducted of records connected to prisoner experimentation. The case was remanded to the Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division so that it could determine the appropriate place to search for documents that might contain the names of experiment subjects and documents that concerned experimentation on prison populations. James D. Hunsberger, 26 DOE ¶ 80,121 (1996). The Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division referred the remand to Nevada.

In its December 30, 1996 Determination Letter, Nevada indicated that its search revealed no responsive documents concerning Mr. Hunsberger. (It did not mention its search of the prisoner experimentation records, however.) On January 31, 1997, Mr. Hunsberger sent a letter indicating his desire to appeal that determination, stating that he would send a further letter explaining his appeal. The OHA received his letter of explanation on May 20, 1997. In his letter Mr. Hunsberger claims for the first time that the appropriate place for a search to be conducted is the DOE's "intelligence elements" which, he feels, are administering the experiments on him.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Acadian Gas Pipeline System, 26 DOE ¶ 80,160 (1997).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted Nevada to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed and to determine whether any documents responsive to Mr. Hunsberger's request might exist. We were informed that Nevada conducted a search of the DOE's Human Radiation Experiment files and Nevada's Radiation Exposure History files. No files containing his name were located.

As stated above, in his Appeal, Mr. Hunsberger expresses for the first time his belief that the "intelligence elements" of the DOE are responsible for the experiments that have been conducted on him "over a period of some 15 years, 24 hours a day with interruptions." Appeal Letter received May 20, 1997, from James D. Hunsberger to Director, OHA, at 1. In response to this claim, this Office asked the DOE's Office of Energy Intelligence (OEI) to conduct a search for any records that contain Mr. Hunsberger's name. We have been informed that it has no such records. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Loretta Lanier, OEI, and William Schwartz, OHA (June 13, 1997).

We are convinced that Nevada followed procedures that were reasonably calculated to uncover the material sought by Mr. Hunsberger in his request. See Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). The fact that the search did not uncover documents Mr. Hunsberger believed may be in the possession of DOE does not mean that the search was inadequate. In addition, Mr. Hunsberger has not provided any evidence, beyond his personal belief, that any additional, relevant documents exist in the DOE's files. Therefore, under the circumstances of this case, we find that Nevada's search for responsive documents was adequate. Accordingly, Mr. Hunsberger's Appeal should be denied.

We note that prison experimentation records are not within the scope of Mr. Hunsberger's present Appeal. However, in response to the September 20, 1996 Decision and Order, Nevada has informed this Office that it recently conducted a search for information concerning experimentation on prisoners and has printed a computer compilation of the titles of some 900 publicly available documents on the subject of prisoner experimentation. Nevada is sending that compilation directly to the appellant. The appellant is encouraged to review the compilation and notify Nevada of any titles that he feels may assist him in his research.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on May 20, 1997, by James D. Hunsberger, Case No. VFA-0267, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Sheet Metal Workers' International Association

Date of Filing: February 11, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0268

On February 11, 1997, Sheet Metal Workers' International Association (the Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on January 3, 1997, by Amy Rothrock, Authorizing Official, Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR). That determination denied a request for information which the Appellant filed on December 12, 1996, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, DOE would be ordered to release in its entirety information that was sought in the December 12, 1996 Request.

In its December 12, 1996 FOIA Request, the Appellant sought, inter alia, copies of the certified payrolls and the apprentice registration forms for the Clean Room installed by a sub-contractor, Liberty Industries, for Lockheed Martin Energy Research Corporation (LMERC), the prime contractor of DOE's X-10 site at Oak Ridge. In the January 3, 1997 determination, DOE/OR found that the requested records are not in the possession of DOE. It also stated that its search did not extend to the files of LMERC. DOE/OR therefore found that it does not possess any responsive records subject to the provisions of the FOIA. The Appellant challenges this determination.

According to the Appellant, the contract to build the Clean Room was a project subject to the Davis-Bacon Act, 40 U.S.C. § 276a. The Appellant asserts that under regulations implementing that Act, DOE is required to possess the requested payroll and apprentice registration forms in order to ensure compliance with the Act's pay provisions. See 29 C.F.R. § 5.5(a)(3)(ii)(A).

After speaking with DOE/OR, we learned that DOE/OR considers the Clean Room contract to be a service contract, and therefore not a construction contract covered by the Davis-Bacon Act.(1)

Thus, under this interpretation, DOE/OR is not required to maintain and, in fact, does not possess any responsive records. See Electronic Mail Message between Amy Rothrock and Dawn Goldstein (February 21, 1997); Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn Goldstein (February 21, 1997). Therefore, DOE/OR's determination that the agency possessed no responsive records subject to the FOIA at the time of the request was correct.

Even though there are no responsive documents in the possession of DOE, a DOE regulation, 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3, requires additional analysis. This regulation states that responsive documents must be disclosed if the contract between the DOE and a contractor provides that those documents are the property of the agency. Under LMERC's current contract with DOE, records and files pertaining to wages, salaries, and benefits and wage, salary and benefit administration are the property of LMERC. See Contract No. DE-AC05-96OR22464 between DOE and LMERC, Provision H.22(b)(5) (DEAR 970.5204-AL 92-84 (November 1992)). The payroll certifications and the apprentice registration forms clearly fall within that provision.(2) Further, since the requested records concern a subcontractor, Liberty Industries, these records could also be considered procurement records, which, under the LMERC contract, also belong solely to the contractor. Thus, Section 1004.3 does not require the release of these records and the present Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Sheet Metal Workers' International Association on February 11, 1997, Case Number VFA-0268, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

George B. Breznay

(1)DOE/OR interpreted the contract this way because installing the Clean Room essentially consisted of putting up some pre-fabricated panels to create a room within an existing room. DOE/OR considered this installation to be service and not construction. See Electronic Mail Message between Amy Rothrock and Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA (February 21, 1997); Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn Goldstein (February 21, 1997).

(2)Apprentice registration forms are necessary to determine which category of pay a construction worker is entitled to under the Davis-Bacon Act. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Patrick J. Riley, Counsel, Appellant, and Dawn Goldstein (February 21, 1997). Thus, these records would pertain to wage administration and accordingly belong to the contractor.

April 14, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Nancy Donaldson

Date of Filing: March 17, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0271

This Decision and Order concerns an Appeal that Nancy Donaldson filed from a determination that was issued to her by the Safety Manager (the Manager) at the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA). The Manager issued that determination in response to a request for information that Ms. Donaldson submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in volume 10 of the Code of Federal Regulations, Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the Manager to conduct a further search for documents responsive to the request.

Background

In her FOIA request, Ms. Donaldson sought access to all documents pertaining to any occupational exposure of her late husband, Don Donaldson, to asbestos or any other known carcinogen during his tenure as a BPA employee from 1972 to 1986. In response to this request, the Manager provided Ms. Donaldson with the results of asbestos testing performed at nine BPA facilities during the years 1985 through 1991 and product inventory sheets compiled in 1990 at two BPA locations. In his determination letter, the Manager stated that no additional documents responsive to Ms. Donaldson's request existed. He explained that prior to 1989, products used in BPA facilities were not documented by product name, company, form or container size. According to the Manager, records of this type were not maintained until approximately 1990, when the BPA performed its first Hazardous Materials Inventory as required by Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) regulations. The Manager also stated that he conducted an informal survey of BPA employees whose jobs were similar to Mr. Donaldson's and who worked at several of the facilities at which Mr. Donaldson was employed. According to the Manager, the results of this study were mostly inconclusive as to the names and manufacturers of the products that these employees used or encountered during their tenure with the BPA. The surveyed employees did indicate, however, that they used alcohol-based aerosols during the course of their employment.

In her Appeal, Ms. Donaldson contends that the Manager's search for responsive documents was inadequate. In support of this claim, she points out that the Manager's response did not include the results of any asbestos testing prior to 1985. In addition, Ms. Donaldson states that the documents provided to her do not mention transite paneling, even though "through discussions with [Mr. Donaldson's] co-workers," she learned that her late husband "regularly and continuously was required to work on, in, and around components and equipment where transite paneling/board was installed and milled just prior to his required, assigned duties." Appeal at 1. Transite paneling contains asbestos.

Analysis

In responding to a request for information under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. The fact that the results of a search may not meet with the requester's expectations does not necessarily mean that the search was inadequate. Robert Hale, 25 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,501 (1995). Instead, in evaluating the adequacy of a search, our inquiry generally focuses on the scope of the search that was performed. See, e.g., Richard J. Levernier, 25 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1995).

In order to evaluate the scope of the search, we contacted the BPA. We were informed that the search for responsive documents included each site at which Mr. Donaldson worked and at which files of any type were maintained.(1) The files of the BPA District Headquarters and Safety Office were searched, and Ms. Donaldson's request was referred to Clayton Environmental, the certified industrial hygiene firm that performed the asbestos testing at BPA facilities during the years 1985 through 1991. See memorandum of April 3, 1997 telephone conversation between Gene McClelland, BPA and Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney.

In her Appeal, Ms. Donaldson argues that the absence of testing data for years prior to 1985 is evidence of an inadequate search. In support of this contention, she claims that the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, 29 U.S.C. §§ 651 et seq., required the BPA to conduct tests to determine the level of asbestos exposure in its facilities. However, the portion of that Act that concerned testing for hazardous materials in the workplace did not apply to the federal government. See 29 U.S.C §§ 651 (definition of "employer"), 655. The testing of federal buildings for asbestos was not legislatively mandated until the passage of the Asbestos Hazard Emergency Response Act of 1986, 15 C.F.R §§ 2641 et seq. Ms. Donaldson's claim that the absence of pre-1985 asbestos testing data is evidence of an inadequate search is therefore without merit.

Ms. Donaldson also claims that the BPA's search was inadequate because it did not include documents concerning the presence of transite paneling at the facilities at which Mr. Donaldson worked. In response to this argument, the BPA points out that Ms. Donaldson's request was for documents relating to the exposure of her husband to carcinogens or toxic materials. The BPA contends that the asbestos fibers in transite paneling are "non-friable" in nature, i.e., that there is no risk of exposure unless the paneling is cut or otherwise disturbed. See memorandum of April 3 telephone conversation between Mr. McClelland and Mr. Palmer. However, in Ms. Donaldson's Appeal, she indicates that she is interested in receiving documents concerning this paneling because her husband allegedly worked in areas where the paneling had recently been milled and installed. In view of these statements, the BPA has agreed to search for documents concerning the presence of transite paneling at the facilities at which Mr. Donaldson was employed. We will therefore remand this portion of the Appeal to the BPA so that this search can be performed.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Ms. Nancy Donaldson, Case Number VFA-0271, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Safety Manager at the Bonneville Power Administration. Within 30 days of the date of this Decision, the Manager will conduct a search for documents concerning the existence of transite paneling at the BPA facilities at which Mr. Donaldson worked, and will issue a new determination to Ms. Donaldson based upon the results of that search.

Date of Filing: February 25, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0272

On February 25, 1997, Chemical Weapons Working Group Inc. (CWWG) filed an Appeal from a determination the Freedom of Information Act Official of the Federal Energy Technology Center (FOIA Official) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to it on January 17, 1997. In that determination, the FOIA Official partially granted a request for information that CWWG filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

I. Background

In its request for information, CWWG sought all records relating to ELI Eco Logic, a provider of a hazardous waste destruction technology called the Eco Logic Process. In her determination, the FOIA Official released five documents in their entirety, withheld portions of three documents with material redacted pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA, withheld two documents in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA, withheld three documents pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA, and withheld another five documents pursuant to both Exemptions 4 and 5 of the FOIA.(1) A representative of the FOIA Official also explained to Leonard Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, in a March 11, 1997 phone conversation, that the FOIA Official meant to withhold an April 27, 1995 Proposal, Volumes I, II and III, pursuant to Exemption 3 of the FOIA, as authorized by the National Defense Authorization Act of 1997 (NDAA), Pub. L. No. 104-201, § 821, 110 Stat. 2422, 2609 (1997) (NDAA).(2) In its Appeal, CWWG requests that the DOE release all of the redacted information and the withheld documents. Moreover, CWWG requests that the FOIA Official conduct an additional search "in light of the apparently deliberate problems with this search." Finally, CWWG requests that, if the FOIA Official withheld information solely because "it was the information that CWWG was seeking," we take disciplinary action against the FOIA Official.

II. Analysis

As an initial matter, even if we were to find that the FOIA Official withheld information solely because "it was the information that CWWG was seeking," we do not have the authority to take disciplinary action against the FOIA Official. See 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Moreover, in our review of this Appeal, we found no reason to believe that the FOIA Official acted improperly.

A. Adequacy of the Search

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In its Appeal, CWWG did not provide any evidence that additional responsive information exists, but cites "deliberate problems" with the original search as a reason for a further search. In our review of the letters between the parties, it became apparent to us that there were no "deliberate problems" with the search as much as a communication problem between representatives of the Federal Energy Technology Center and CWWG. This communication problem involved confusion over what exactly CWWG originally requested. Once the parties clarified CWWG's request, the FOIA Official responded to CWWG's request.

As part of our review, we contacted a representative of the FOIA Official to inquire about the details surrounding her search.(3) The representative of the FOIA Official informed us that she contacted the Associate Director and several other officials of the Office of Project Management, the Director of Environment and Waste Management, the Project Manager for the SAIC contract, the contract specialist dealing with the SAIC contract in the Acquisition and Assistance Division, and the FOIA Officer at the Pittsburgh Energy Technology Center to request that they search their records for responsive information. We find that the FOIA Officer searched the areas that might have reasonably contained responsive information. Since the FOIA Officer conducted a thorough search and verified that no additional responsive documents exist, and since CWWG has not suggested other locations to search, we must deny this portion of the Appeal.

B. Exemption 3

Exemption 3 of the FOIA allows agencies to withhold information if specifically authorized by another federal statute. However, the withholding statute must meet strict statutory guidelines. An agency properly invokes Exemption 3 only where the withholding statute "(A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). A statute falls within the Exemption's coverage if it satisfies either of its standards. See Long v. IRS, 742 F.2d 1173, 1178 (9th Cir. 1984). The D.C. Circuit has stated that the Exemption 3 analysis under the FOIA is not dependent on the factual content of the documents at issue; instead "the sole issue for decision is the existence of a relevant statute and the inclusion of withheld material within the statute's coverage." Fitzgibbon v. CIA, 911 F.2d 755, 761 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Fitzgibbon) (quoting Association of Retired Railroad Workers v. U.S. Railroad Retirement Board, 830 F.2d 331, 336 (D.C. Cir. 1987)).

The Supreme Court has established a two-prong standard of review for Exemption 3 cases. See CIA v. Sims, 471 U.S. 159, 167 (1985); Fitzgibbon, 911 F.2d at 761 (applying the Sims test). First, the agency must determine whether the statute in question is a statute of exemption as contemplated by Exemption 3. Id. at 167. Second, the agency must determine whether the withheld material satisfies the criteria of the exemption statute.

The NDAA is a federal statute that contains language specifically prohibiting the FOIA official from releasing protected information. The pertinent part of the NDAA states that "[e]xcept as provided . . . , a proposal in the possession or control of an executive agency may not be made available to any person under section 552 of title 5, United States Code." NDAA at 2609. The statute states, however, that it "does not apply to any proposal that is set forth or incorporated by reference in a contract entered into between the agency and the contractor that submitted the proposal." Id. Since the NDAA allows contracting officials no discretion in withholding certain types of information, we find that it meets the subpart (A) requirement of Exemption 3. Having satisfied the threshold inquiry by classifying the NDAA as a statute of exemption, we must now determine if the information withheld from CWWG satisfies the criteria of the statute.

To satisfy Exemption 3, the Proposal withheld from CWWG must meet the criteria laid out above in the NDAA. We conclude that the DOE properly withheld the Proposal. We reviewed the document and find that it is a "proposal in the possession or control" of the DOE "submitted by a contractor in response to the requirements of a solicitation for a competitive proposal." NDAA at 2609. Furthermore, a representative of the FOIA Official informed us that the final contract between the DOE and the contractor does not set forth or incorporate by reference any part of the Proposal. Thus, the FOIA Official has no discretion to release the Proposal. Accordingly, we find that the FOIA Official properly applied Exemption 3 and the NDAA to the requested Proposal.

C. Exemption 4 and Exemption 5

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provides to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In choosing between these two tests, we have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposals. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

The FOIA Official cited Exemption 4 as a basis for withholding in their entirety a "Cost Plan submitted 11/22/96," and a "Draft Sampling and Analysis Plan prepared by SAIC." In addition, the FOIA Official withheld portions of three other documents with material redacted pursuant to Exemption 4. We reviewed all these documents and find that each of them contains commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. Furthermore, the submitter, SAIC, created and provided all these documents to the DOE specifically for the purpose of acquiring a contract. See Industrial Constructors Corporation, 25 DOE ¶ 80,196 (1996) (Industrial); Tri-City Herald, 16 DOE ¶ 80,114 (1987). The DOE also obtained this material from a "person" as required by Exemption 4, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). We also conclude that much of the information withheld, cost data and analytical methods and procedures, is confidential because its release would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. We have stated in the past that release of cost and financial information could be used by a competitor to undercut another firm's bids and thus effectively eliminate the disclosing firm from competition. See Industrial; International Technology Corporation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1992); U.S. Rentals, 21 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1991). In this case, were the submitter to release, for example, its cost estimates for completing specific tasks and reveal its unique methods and procedures to accomplish these tasks, any competitor could easily determine how to adjust its own costs and approach to arrive at a lower contract price and plan to ultimately beat the submitter's best price and procedures in a future bid process. However, we find that some information in these documents, including cover sheets, background information and headings is releasable. Accordingly, we will require the FOIA Official to either release cover sheets, background information and headings from these documents or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter- agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The FOIA Official withheld the following three documents in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5: (1) Addendum to Selection Statement dated December 12, 1995; (2) Memorandum from W. Huber to T. Martin re: Technical Evaluation of SAIC's EcoLogic #DE-RO21-96MC33091; and (3) NEPA Determination dated April 25, 1996. We reviewed the documents withheld in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5 and find that they contain information both predecisional and deliberative pursuant to Exemption 5. In fact, we have confirmed that the information withheld pursuant to Exemption 5 contains opinions and interpretations from various DOE employees, the disclosure of which would discourage open, frank discussions between these individuals. Specifically, the Addendum to Selection Statement has a DOE employee's comments and notes to other DOE employees regarding different aspects of the selection process. The Huber Memorandum contains a DOE employee's evaluation of the submitter's proposal to another DOE employee. Likewise, the NEPA Determination is another document intended for internal DOE review regarding the submitter's compliance with the National Environmental Policy Act. All these documents are clearly predecisional and deliberative in their nature and their release could inhibit honest communication and evaluations by DOE employees in the future. However, we find that some information in these documents, including cover sheets and headings, are releasable. Accordingly, we will require the FOIA Official to release cover sheets and headings contained in these documents or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

The FOIA Official cited Exemption 4 and Exemption 5 as a basis to withhold five documents: (1) a "PC note dated April 8, 1996, from James Marsh to W. Huber"; (2) a "Memorandum dated April 3, 1996 from W. Huber to R. Manilla re: Technical Evaluation of SAIC Contract"; (3) an "April 3, 1996, memorandum from Huber to Manilla re: Discussed cost analysis"; (4) a "Price Negotiation Memorandum dated September 16, 1996"; and (5) a "Response to Revised SOW [Statement of Work] dated July 30, 1996." The April 8, 1996 "PC note" from Marsh to Huber is nearly identical to the "April 3, 1996, memorandum from Huber to Manilla re: Discussed cost analysis." One document is a hard copy of an E-mail note and the other is the paper copy of the same memorandum. These documents describe a DOE employee's views expressed on a Statement of Work regarding EcoLogic. Similarly, the "Memorandum dated April 3, 1996 from W. Huber to R. Manilla re: Technical Evaluation of SAIC Contract" contains a DOE employee's thoughts to another DOE employee regarding the submitter. All these memoranda's contents are clearly predecisional and deliberative in their nature. Thus, the release of this information could inhibit honest communication and evaluations by DOE employees in the future. However, we find that the headings of these memoranda are not information withholdable under Exemption 4 or Exemption 5. Accordingly, we will order the FOIA Official to release the headings of these memoranda.

The "Price Negotiation Memorandum dated September 16, 1996" contains cost and pricing information based on information the submitter provided to the DOE and recommendations regarding price negotiation. This document also contains commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4 and deliberative predecisional information within the meaning of Exemption 5. The release of the commercial information would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. Furthermore, the recommendations regarding price negotiation are clearly predecisional and deliberative in their nature and their release could inhibit honest communication and evaluations by DOE employees in the future. However, we find that the first page of the Price Negotiation Memorandum contains some background information that is not withholdable under either Exemption 4 or Exemption 5. Accordingly, we will require the FOIA Official to either release background information on the first page or provide a detailed explanation for withholding.

The "Response to Revised SOW [Statement of Work] dated July 30, 1996" is a document created by the submitter detailing to the DOE its approach and work plan, including staffing and schedule and cost estimates. This document clearly contains commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. However, we do not find any information in this document withholdable under Exemption 5. Furthermore, we find that the first four pages of this document contain background information that is not withholdable under Exemption 4. Accordingly, we will require the FOIA Official to release background information on the first four pages of this document or provide a detailed explanation for withholding.

III. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. We have determined that Exemption 3 and the NDAA require the continued withholding of the April 27, 1995 Proposal submitted by SAIC. Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information, we are not permitted such consideration where, as in the application of Exemption 3, the applicable statute requires non-disclosure.

In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we also do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

Notwithstanding our finding that the FOIA Official properly applied Exemption 5 to the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless demands disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. In the present case, the requested information consists of the opinions of individuals regarding different aspects of the bid proposal process involving the submitter. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of employees and managers to make candid statements of opinion in these types of bid processes. Employees and managers would be less likely to communicate their opinions during such bid processes if they knew or suspected that an agency would release their opinions to the public. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the requested documents would not be in the public interest.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Chemical Weapons Working Group, Inc. on February 25, 1997, Case No. VFA-0272, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Act Official of the Federal Energy Technology Center (FETC) of the Department of Energy who will release cover sheets, background information and headings from any material withheld under Exemption 4 in the FETC's January 17, 1997 determination letter to Chemical Weapons Working Group, Inc. or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information after taking into account the submitter's views regarding the impact of possible release. Furthermore, we will require the FOIA Official to release cover sheets and headings withheld under Exemption 5 in the FETC's January 17, 1997 determination letter to Chemical Weapons Working Group, Inc. or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information. We will also require the FOIA Official to release the headings in the following documents: (1) "PC note dated April 8, 1996, from James Marsh to W. Huber"; (2) "Memorandum dated April 3, 1996 from W. Huber to R. Manilla re: Technical Evaluation of SAIC Contract"; (3) "April 3, 1996, memorandum from Huber to Manilla re: Discussed cost analysis"; (4) "Price Negotiation Memorandum dated September 16, 1996"; and (5) "Response to Revised SOW dated July 30, 1996." We will require the FOIA Official to either release background information on the first page of the "Price Negotiation Memorandum dated September 16, 1996" or provide a detailed explanation for withholding. Finally, we will require the FOIA Official to either release background information on the first four pages of the "Response to Revised SOW dated July 30, 1996" or provide a detailed explanation for withholding.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: March 25, 1997

(1) In the determination letter, the FOIA Official described one of the documents as follows:

Transmittal letter from SAIC [Science Applications International Corporation] transmitting "proposal" to Thomas Martin, DOE, re:SAIC contract dated July 30, 1996. Enclosed proposed work plan withheld in its entirety under exemption 4 referenced above.

A representative of the FOIA Official informed us that the "[e]nclosed proposed work plan" is actually the same document as the document called the "Response to Revised SOW [Statement of Work] dated July 30, 1996, work plan references EcoLogic process" withheld in its entirety under both Exemption 4 and Exemption 5. See March 11, 1997 Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, and Debra Murphy, Federal Energy Technology Center. We have included this document in the category of documents withheld under both Exemption 4 and Exemption 5. Also, the representative of the FOIA Official informed us that the FOIA Official released "SITE Superfund Innovative Technology Evaluation, Technology Profiles" in its entirety.

(2) In her determination letter, the FOIA Official cited only the NDAA and failed to cite explicitly Exemption 3 in withholding the April 27, 1995 Proposal.

March 28, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Burlin McKinney

Case Number: VFA-0273

On March 3, 1997, Burlin McKinney (McKinney) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on February 20, 1997, by the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied in part McKinney's request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

I. Background

On May 23, 1995, McKinney submitted a letter to the DOE Office of Occupational Safety requesting information on the beryllium health and safety program at the Y-12 plant in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. DOE's Freedom of Information Act/Privacy Group (DOE/HQ) forwarded one document to the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) for review, and this document (referred to as "Document 13") was later released to McKinney. On October 24, 1995, McKinney submitted a memorandum to DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR) requesting all documents pertaining to an August 19, 1987 OIG investigation of alleged illegal activity at that facility. DOE/OR located three responsive documents and forwarded copies to OIG for review. OIG released redacted versions to McKinney. Document 13 was again released to McKinney, but with all personal pronouns redacted. See Letter from McKinney to Director, OHA (March 3, 1997). DOE/OR also sent a copy of the memorandum to DOE/HQ, which again forwarded the request to the OIG for processing. On February 20, 1997, the OIG released additional documents, all but two redacted, to McKinney. See Letter from Assistant Inspector General For Investigations to McKinney (February 20, 1997) (Determination Letter). Portions of the documents were withheld under FOIA Exemptions 5, 6, and 7(C). The OIG released a total of 26 documents in response to both requests.

In his Appeal, McKinney requests that OIG (1) release the personal pronouns in all documents, since these pronouns were previously released to him in Document 13(1); (2) release all references to Martin Marietta Energy Systems (MMES) supervision and management in order to make the documents easier to read; (3) release all references to DOE employees and DOE contractor employees; (4) release all references to letters and documents; and (5) review all documents again.

II. Analysis

A. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents which are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege, and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corporation v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). In withholding a portion of Document 6 from McKinney, the OIG relied upon the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5.

The deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government decisions and policies are formulated. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. It is intended to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939 (Cl. Ct.1958)) (Mink). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. In order to be shielded by Exemption 5, a document must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id.

After reviewing Document 6, we conclude that the OIG correctly applied Exemption 5 in its determination. The document at issue is an OIG form entitled "Memo To Enter Data Into IGMIS." This memo refers to a case based on a complaint alleging contractor safety violations and irregularities in time cards at DOE/OR. The OIG deleted the section entitled "Remarks," which contains the recommendation of an OIG employee for the next steps to take in processing the case. This memo, written by a DOE employee for internal DOE purposes, is an agency memorandum. Furthermore, the material in the Remarks section is both predecisional and deliberative. It was written before the DOE, and specifically the OIG, adopted a final position on the case in question. Finally, we note that the release of this recommendation could inhibit employees from expressing their candid views if they believed that those views could become public knowledge. Therefore, the Remarks section of Document 6 is precisely the sort of record of the deliberative and "thinking" processes which Exemption 5 is designed to protect. Sears, 421 U.S. at 153 (quoting Davis, The Information Act: A Preliminary Analysis, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 761, 797 (1967)). See also Perkins Coie, 26 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1996). Accordingly, we hold that the withheld portion of Document 6 meets all the requirements for withholding material under the Exemption 5 deliberative process privilege. In addition, we conclude that release of this material would cause reasonably foreseeable harm to the interests the agency is protecting under Exemption 5 and therefore is not in the public interest.

However, both the FOIA and the implementing DOE regulations require that non-exempt material which may be reasonably segregated from withheld material be released to a requester. 5 U.S.C. §552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(c). See Mink, 410 U.S. at 73, 89 (1972); Boulder Scientific Company, 19 DOE ¶ 80,126 at 80,577 n.3 (1989). Exemption 5 only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. Factual information contained in the protected document must be disclosed unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material or the non-exempt material is so small and interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate it. See Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971); Lead Industries Association, Inc. v. Occupational Safety and Health Administration, 610 F.2d 70, 85 (2d Cir. 1979). Our review of Document 6 reveals that all other non-exempt material was disclosed to the requester. Thus we find that the OIG, pursuant to DOE regulations, properly released those portions of Document 6 containing factual or non-exempt material.

B. Exemptions 6 and 7(C)

The OIG withheld material in twenty-four documents pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Both exemptions allow the withholding of information dealing with personal privacy. Exemption 6 permits the non-disclosure of "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10 (b)(6). Exemption 7(C) applies to a much narrower class of cases, but has a less exacting standard that gives it somewhat more expansive coverage. Under Exemption 7(C), agencies may withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of a personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). Both of these exemptions require a balance of the interest in personal privacy in the withheld information against the public interest in the same information. See Michael Grosche, 26 DOE ¶ 80,146 (1996) (Grosche).

There are, however, two significant differences between Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Under Exemption 7(C), the information must have been compiled for law enforcement purposes. In addition, because information may be withheld where there is only a reasonable expectation of an "unwarranted invasion of a personal privacy," there is a lower threshold of privacy interest employed in Exemption 7(C) than in Exemption 6 where the balance calls for a "clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy" (emphasis added). Because, as we find below, the documents at issue in this case meet Exemption 7's threshold test, we need only examine the withholding under the standard of Exemption 7(C). See, e.g., Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,620 (1995); K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,550 (1992); Grosche, 26 DOE at 80,643.

Applying these standards to the documents in this case, we find that the records sought by the appellant were compiled for a law enforcement purpose. The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether the agency compiled such information as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The OIG is an investigative, law enforcement body charged with investigating and correcting waste, fraud or abuse in programs administered or financed by the DOE. See Inspector General Act of 1978, codified as amended at 5 U.S.C. app. §§2(1)-(2), 4(a)(1), (3)-(4), (d), 6(a)(1)-(4), 7(a), 9(a)(1)(E). In this case, the OIG was investigating allegations of fraud and safety violations at DOE/OR. As a result of its duties, we find that the OIG compiles reports involving official misconduct for "law enforcement purposes" within the meaning of Exemption 7(C). See Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1995); Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,659 (1997).

Once the material qualifies for withholding under Exemption 7, we consider whether release of the withheld material would result in one of the harms listed in Exemption 7. Ferguson v. Federal Bureau of Investigation, 957 F.2d 1059, 1065 (2d Cir. 1992). The OIG believes that withholding names and information that would tend to disclose the identity of certain individuals will protect their privacy "so that they will be free from harassment, intimidation and other personal intrusions." See Determination Letter at 2. We have previously stated that a name by itself does not create a protectable privacy interest for the purposes of FOIA exemption analysis. The News Tribune, 25 DOE ¶ 80,181 at 80,700 (1996). Rather, the privacy interest exists when a name is linked with information that reveals something personal or private about an individual. Id. at 80,699. In this case, many of the names in the OIG files are linked with job titles, dates of employment, and documents that reveal some personal information about the individual. We have stated previously that a person has a strong privacy interest in the fact that he or she was the subject of or interviewed during a potential criminal investigation. See Blumberg, Seng, Ikeda & Albers, 25 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,563 (1995); Jon Berg, 22 DOE ¶ 80,140 at 80,587 (1992). This is because linking a person with a potential criminal investigation would result in harassment and considerable embarrassment. Manna v. Department of Justice, 51 F.3d 1158, 1166 (3d Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 116 S. Ct. 477 (1995). Therefore, we find that the OIG was correct in withholding from McKinney not only the names of individuals involved in the Oak Ridge investigation, but identifying information as well.

In determining whether the disclosure of law enforcement records could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, courts have used a balancing test, weighing the privacy interests that would be infringed against the public interest in disclosure. Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762 (1989) (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii)) (Reporters Committee). Case law dictates that information withheld under Exemption 7(C) falls within the public interest for the purposes of the FOIA only if "release of the information is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operation of the government." Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 775. See also Department of Defense v. Federal Labor Relations Auth., 510 U.S. 487, 494-95 (1994).

The OIG found no fraud or criminal violation in this investigation. Releasing the names of those individuals whom the OIG concluded were not responsible for any fabrication of time cards or safety violations would add little to the public's knowledge of governmental activity. This office has consistently found that withholding the names of witnesses better serves the public interest because it allows witnesses to speak freely to government investigators without fear that their identities will be disclosed and that they will be subject to possible harassment. Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,523-24 (1990); The Die-Gem Co., 19 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,569 (1989).

Therefore, we find that there is no public interest in the withheld information. The privacy interest of the named individuals outweighs the public interest in the release of the names of persons investigated. The public interest is satisfied by release of the facts and conclusions of the investigation. Robert E. Caddell, 20 DOE ¶ 80,103 at 80,508-09 (1990). See also McCutchen v. HHS, 30 F.3d 183 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (protecting the identities of scientists investigated and exonerated on charges of scientific misconduct).

C. Other Information Withheld

The OIG also withheld dates of letters and other documents and the subjects of letters and documents. The requester asks that some of this material be released to improve the "readability" of the documents. It is not the purpose of the FOIA appeal process to provide a requester with documents that are easy to read. However, we must provide the requester with all non-exempt material which may be reasonably segregated from withheld material. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(c). In addition, we must provide this material unless it would pose an "inordinate burden" to do. We have reviewed the withheld documents, and find that some words that were redacted do not appear to be exempt under the FOIA. For example, in several documents, the same word is released in one sentence and redacted in another. Thus, we find that the documents should be reviewed to determine that all releasable information is segregated from the exempt material and provided to the requester in a consistent fashion as required by DOE regulations. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(3).

The appellant also requests the job title and name of a DOE employee, assigned to the Office of the General Counsel (OGC) at DOE Headquarters, who was interviewed in the course of this investigation. This information was withheld under Exemptions 6 and 7(C). The OIG advised us that they withheld that information to protect the employee's privacy. We concur with their withholding of portions of the record of the interview in order to protect the privacy of the employee. We find that the document has been appropriately redacted, and that the OIG properly released all non-exempt material to the requester.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Burlin McKinney on March 3, 1997, Case Number VFA-0273, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of Inspector General, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The OIG has agreed that the redactions of personal pronouns were inconsistent. They have agreed to release personal pronouns in Documents 3, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, and 14. Also, because the word "supervisor" was released in Documents 13 and 16, that word will be released also. Case No. VFA-0274 26 DOE ¶ 80,174

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Richard J. Levernier

Case Number: VFA-0274

On March 5, 1997, Richard J. Levernier (Levernier) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on February 27, 1997, by the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied in part Levernier's request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

The FOIA requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the federal government, and not made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). The FOIA also lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9);10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure will nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In a January 29, 1997 FOIA request, Levernier requested a copy of an OIG report regarding the investigation of allegations that an individual at the DOE's Rocky Flats Environmental Technology Site (Rocky Flats) tape recorded telephone conversations. OIG provided Levernier redacted copies of two documents in its February 27, 1997 determination letter. One of the documents was an OIG Abstract Report of Inspections entitled "Alleged Tape Recording of Conversations at the Rocky Flats Environmental Technology Site and Other Management Issues" (Abstract). The other document was a memo from the Deputy Inspector General for Inspections to various DOE officials which described the findings and conclusions in the Abstract (Memo). In its determination letter, OIG stated that names and other information which would tend to disclose the identity of individuals who provided information to OIG were withheld from the released copies of the Memo and Abstract pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C) of the FOIA. OIG noted in its determination letter that Exemption 6 protects from disclosure "personnel and medical and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." OIG also noted that Exemption 7(C) provides protection from disclosure for records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes but only to the extent that production of such documents could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. OIG concluded that individuals named in the Abstract and Memo were entitled to protection from harassment or other personal intrusions and that the public interest in the identity of the individuals whose names appear in these documents does not outweigh the individuals' privacy interests.

Levernier challenges the OIG's withholding of material from the Memo and Abstract and asserts a number of arguments. First, Levernier argues that the documents at issue do not qualify for Exemption 6 protection since the documents are not "personnel, medical or similar files." Second, Levernier argues that the documents are not protected by Exemption 7(C) since they were not records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes. In support of this argument, Levernier asserts that the OIG Office of Inspections is responsible for only the following functions: (1) inspections and analyses; (2) reviews based on administrative allegations received by the OIG; and (3) processing Inspector General referrals to DOE management for appropriate action. He alleges that none of these functions relate to law enforcement. Lastly, Levernier argues that DOE and DOE contractor personnel should not be entitled to any privacy protections for decisions and actions they made in the course of their official duties.

II. Analysis

Both Exemptions 6 and 7(C) allow the withholding of information dealing with personal privacy. The former permits the non-disclosure of "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). Exemption 7(C) applies to a much narrower class of cases, but has a less exacting standard that gives it somewhat more expansive coverage. Under Exemption 7(C), agencies may withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information... (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of a personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). Both of these exemptions require a balance of the interest in personal privacy in the withheld information against the public interest in the same information. There are, however, two significant differences between Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Under Exemption 7 (C), the withheld information must be compiled as a part of, or in connection with, an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). In addition, because information may be withheld where there is only a reasonable expectation of an "unwarranted invasion of a personal privacy," there is a lower threshold of privacy interest employed in Exemption 7(C) than in Exemption 6 where the balance calls for a "clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy" (emphasis added). Because, as we find below, the documents at issue in this case meet Exemption 7's threshold test, we need only examine the withholding under the standard of Exemption 7(C). See, e.g., Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,620 (1995); K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,550 (1992).

Initially, we must reject Levernier's arguments regarding the non-law enforcement nature of the Abstract and Memo and find that these documents were compiled for a law enforcement purpose. The Exemption 7 "law enforcement" exception to mandatory release of information under the FOIA encompasses compliance with both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F. 2d. 73, 81 n.46 (D.C. Cir 1974). The OIG is charged with investigating and correcting waste, fraud and abuse in programs administered or financed by the DOE. See Inspector General Act of 1978, codified as amended at 5 U.S.C. app. §§ 2(1)-(2), 4(a)(1), (3)-(4), (d), 6(a)(1)-(4), 7(a), 9(a)(1)(E). Both documents were created in connection with an OIG investigation concerning possible violation of DOE regulations and orders as a result of the taping of telephone conversations by an individual employed at Rocky Flats. Consequently, we find that the Memo and Abstract were compiled for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7(C).

In evaluating this Appeal, we have reviewed unredacted copies of the Memo and Abstract. The material withheld by the OIG consists of the names of the individuals who provided information referenced in the documents along with certain words or phrases whose release, OIG asserts, would also disclose the identities of the individuals when viewed in combination with the released information in the documents. In determining whether the release of the names in the Abstract and Memo could be reasonably expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, we note that the courts have used a balancing test which weighs the privacy interests that would be infringed against the public's interest in disclosure. Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762 (1989) (Reporters Committee). We have consistently found that subjects, sources and witnesses mentioned in OIG files have a strong privacy interest in remaining anonymous. See Blumberg, Seng, Ikeda & Albers, 25 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1995).

In his Appeal, however, Levernier has argued that DOE officials and contractor personnel should not be entitled to privacy protections for actions taken in the course of their official duties. This argument is without merit. While we recognize that federal employees have a smaller expectation of privacy than private citizens, a privacy interest nevertheless exists when the association of a federal or contractor employee's name with a law enforcement file could subject the employee to harassment and embarrassment. See KTTY-TV v. U.S., 919 F.2d 1465 (10th Cir 1990) (interviewees mentioned in U.S. Postal Service investigation report found to have a legitimate privacy interest in not being harassed or embarrassed by other persons); but see William H. Payne, 25 DOE ¶ 80,190 (1996) (federal employees have diminished privacy interest because of public interest in knowing how public employees are doing their jobs). Thus, an individual's privacy interest exists whether or not an investigation concerns actions taken in the course of the individual's official duties. Accordingly, we find that the individuals in the present case have a strong privacy interest.

We further find there is little, if any, public interest in revelation of the names of the individuals in the documents at issue. In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court held that the public interest which is to be considered in the FOIA context is limited to that which sheds light on government activities and operations. 489 U.S. at 773-75. Release of the names in the Memo and Abstract would simply produce no additional information regarding OIG activities or operations. Consequently, the balance of these factors in the present case indicates that the release of the names would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

The remaining information which was deleted from the Abstract and Memo consists of scattered descriptive words or phrases. Under Exemptions 6 and 7(C), names and other information that would tend to disclose the identity of individuals entitled to privacy protection may be withheld. Southwest Resource Development, 24 DOE ¶ 80,164 (1995) (Southwest). Within the context of the released portions of the Abstract and Memo, these words and phrases might identify an individual by disclosing certain functions performed by that individual. See Southwest. As discussed above, in this case, the little public interest in the identity of the individuals whose names have been deleted from the Abstract and Memo does not outweigh these individuals' privacy interest in being free from intrusion into their private lives. Consequently, the release of identifying information would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy. Accordingly, because OIG properly applied Exemption 7(C) to the withheld information in the Abstract and Memo, this Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Richard J. Levernier, OHA Case No. VFA-0274, is hereby denied.

March 28, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Alexander German

Case Number: VFA-0275

On March 11, 1997, Alexander German (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on February 7, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (IG). In that determination, the IG released copies of 14 responsive documents in their entirety and an additional 11 responsive documents from which information had been deleted. This partial release occurred in response to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

I. BACKGROUND

The Appellant submitted a request for information to the DOE seeking copies of all documents regarding "reports to the IG by employee hotline regarding Case No. I95RS080." Determination Letter at 1. On February 7, 1997, the IG issued a determination in response to this request releasing 14 documents in their entirety and withholding portions of 11 other documents under Exemptions 6 and 7(C). The withheld portions consist of names, and other identifying information, of certain individuals. On March 13, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that the DOE's withholding of the deleted information was improper.

II. ANALYSIS

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemptions 6 and 7(C) are at issue in the present case.

In the determination letter, the IG claims that release of the withheld information would reveal the identities of potential witnesses, informants and confidential sources. Since release of these individuals' identities might subject them to harassment, intimidation or other personal intrusions, the IG has withheld them under both Exemptions 6 and 7(C). The Appellant contends that the IG improperly applied these exemptions.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Williams v. IRS, 479 F.2d 317, 318 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom. Donolon v. IRS, 414 U.S. 1024 (1973). By law, the IG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. The IG is therefore a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate. In the present case the IG's investigatory actions were clearly within this statutory mandate.

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

We have previously considered cases in which both Exemption 6 and 7(C) were invoked, and we stated that in such cases, provided the Exemption 7 threshold of law enforcement purpose is met, we would analyze the withholding only under Exemption 7(C), the broader of the two exemptions. See, e.g., K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1992); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1991); James E. Phelps, 20 DOE ¶ 80,169 (1990); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,109 (1990); Jerry O. Campbell, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988). Since all of the documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes, any document that satisfies Exemption 7(C)'s "reasonableness" standard will be protected. Conversely, documents not protected by Exemption 7(C) will be unable to satisfy Exemption 6's more restrictive requirement that they constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

(1) Privacy Interest

Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals providing information to government investigators. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (KTVY-TV) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985) (Cucarro); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,524 (1990). Accordingly, we find that the individuals whose identities are being withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

(2) Public Interest in Disclosure

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 109 S. Ct. at 1481-84. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 1483. Therefore, the Court held, only that information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989); cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

It is well settled that disclosure of the identity of individuals who have provided information to government investigators is not "affected with the public interest." See, e.g., Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1205; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469. In the absence of a compelling reason for deviating from this body of precedent, we reach that conclusion in the present case.

(3) The Balancing Test

Because release of the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to subject them to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Our findings are consistent with those reached by several appellate courts. When presented with a similar set of facts, these courts have found that the privacy interests of individuals supplying information to government investigators clearly outweigh the negligible public interest in disclosure of these individuals' identities. See, e.g., Safecard; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469 (finding withholding necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro, 770 F.2d at 359.

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about the DOE, we are also concerned about preserving the privacy rights of individuals providing information to the IG's investigators. By releasing the responsive documents with only those redactions necessary to prevent identification of specific individuals, the agency has provided as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights.

III. CONCLUSION

On the basis of the facts presented and federal case law, we find significant privacy interests in the individuals' identities. We also find that disclosure would not significantly increase the public's understanding of the operations and activities of the government. Accordingly, we find that this information was properly withheld under Exemptions 6 and 7(C).

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Applicant:Terry J. Fox

Date of Filing: March 7, 1997

On March 7, 1997, Terry J. Fox of Lacey, Washington, filed an Appeal from a determination issued on February 5, 1997 by the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied Mr. Fox's request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the federal government, and which have not been made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). This Appeal, if granted, would require BPA to conduct another search of its files for responsive information.

BACKGROUND

In his FOIA request, Mr. Fox sought a list generated from computer record logs in the possession of BPA of all long-distance telephone calls made from his brother's telephone number at BPA from December 1995 through November 1996, the date of his request. BPA responded on February 5, 1997. In its determination letter BPA informed Mr. Fox that there were no records responsive to his request. In fact, BPA stated that after checking the computer tape telephone logs, not only were there no records of outgoing calls for his brother's telephone number, there were no records of outgoing calls from any BPA telephone number starting with the same three number prefix as his brother's number. In fact, computer tapes did not list the originating BPA telephone number for any outgoing call. Further, according to the determination letter, in an attempt to satisfy Mr. Fox's request for information, BPA also contacted Mr. Fox and offered to search for particular telephone numbers that had been called from BPA. However, Mr. Fox apparently responded that he did not know which numbers to search for, and that finding the numbers that were called is the purpose of his FOIA request. Finally, the determination letter states that there were no records in a separate list of any cellular phone calls made by his brother. Mr. Fox appeals the determination. He also requests that we bring this matter to the attention of the DOE Inspector General.

Under the FOIA, in response to an appropriate request that reasonably describes the information sought and conforms to agency regulations, an agency must search its records and release responsive, unpublished, non-exempt information that it has created or obtained. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3), (b); Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 144-45 (1989); James L. Schwab, 22 DOE ¶ 80,127 at 80,558 (1992). A search that complies with the FOIA need not cover every corner of the agency. Oglesby

v. Department of the Army, 920 F.2d 57, 68 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (and cases cited therein); Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1383 (8th Cir. 1985); Martha L. Powers, 24 DOE ¶ 80,147 at 80,618 (1994); Citizens' Action Committee of Pike County Citizens, 22 DOE ¶ 80,178 at 80,679 (1993). Rather, an adequate search under the FOIA need only be one reasonably calculated to uncover the documents requested. Kowalczyk v. Department of Justice, 73 F.3d 386, 389 (D.C. Cir. 1996); Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (and cases cited therein); Thomas Stampahar, 26 DOE ¶ 80,140 at 80,593-94 (1996); ; Energy Products, Inc., 23 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,528 (1993). "An adequate search, however, must be 'a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents.'" Energy Research Foundation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529 (1992) (quoting The Lowry Coalition, 21 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,535 (1991)). This FOIA search standard has been specifically adopted by the federal courts of the Ninth Circuit where both Mr. Fox and BPA are located. Citizens Commission on Human Rights v. Food and Drug Admin., 45 F.3d 1325, 1328 (9th Cir. 1995); Zemansky v. Environmental Protection Agency, 767 F.2d 569, 571 (9th Cir. 1985). In its application of this standard, this Office will remand a case for further action if it is evident that an inadequate search was conducted, or if evidence reveals that other documents that were not identified during the initial search exist. Linda J. Carlisle, 24 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,560 (1994); McGraw-Hill Nuclear Publications, 22 DOE ¶ 80,157 at 80,627 (1992).

We contacted BPA to determine if it performed a proper search. BPA informs us that there are no responsive cellular telephone records because it did not issue to Mr. Fox's brother a cell phone. However, the records for the non-cellular telephone calls present a different issue. There is no question that Mr. Fox's brother is a BPA employee with the phone number that Mr. Fox listed in his FOIA request. Because Mr. Fox's brother's telephone number has the most common prefix at BPA, we asked BPA to conduct another full search of its telephone computer tapes. BPA informed us that these computer tapes are the only BPA records that might have the information Mr. Fox seeks. As a means of control comparison, we also asked BPA to search the computer tapes for phone calls made from BPA to certain telephone numbers at DOE Headquarters in the Forrestal Building in Washington, D.C. As a second control, we asked that BPA search for Mr. Fox's home phone number in its records of outgoing calls to determine if he was the recipient of any calls placed from a BPA telephone.

BPA has completed the search of the telephone logs we requested. It searched for all of the months Mr. Fox listed in his FOIA request. As a result of this search BPA has again found that its records do not list any telephone calls as specifically coming from Mr. Fox's brother's BPA telephone number. The results of the control search explain the reason for this. BPA reports thousands of telephone calls were made to DOE Headquarters during the search period. However, the computer tapes record only a few general BPA switchboard numbers as the outgoing source. They are not listed by individual BPA telephone numbers. After investigating this matter for us, the BPA FOIA office states that not all of its current telecommunications equipment has the capability to correlate individual telephone calls to particular telephones from which they were made. While this may change in the future, BPA avows that for the period covered by its FOIA search in this case, the information in the computer tape logs only shows general BPA numbers as the sources of outgoing calls. Finally, BPA's search for calls to Mr. Fox's telephone from BPA revealed no matches with his number.

As the foregoing demonstrates, BPA has done an adequate job in attempting to satisfy Mr. Fox's request. We find that the searches it completed were reasonably calculated and conscientiously performed to reveal the records Mr. Fox seeks. Cf. Archie M. LeGrand, Jr., 25 DOE ¶ 80,171 at 80,681 (1996). Thus we find that the BPA search satisfied the requirements of the FOIA. Given the state of the BPA records, there simply are no responsive documents that conform to Mr. Fox's request. Accordingly, Mr. Fox's Appeal should be denied. Finally, there were no responsive documents demonstrating any wrongdoing, and without deciding whether there is an appropriate forum in which to consider Mr. Fox's request, we will not refer this matter to the DOE Inspector General.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Terry J. Fox of Lacey, Washington, OHA Case No. VFA-0276, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Daniel J. Bruno

Case Number: VFA-0277

On March 7, 1997, Daniel J. Bruno (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on February 23, 1997 by the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the DOE released copies of 33 documents requested by the Appellant. However, portions of several of these documents were withheld under FOIA Exemption 6. This partial release occurred in response to a request for information filed by the Appellant, under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release an additional document.

The sole issue before us is the Appellant's contention that the DOE should have located and released to him a copy of a written statement allegedly submitted by a Ms. Linda Ruhnow to a Ms. Caryl A. Butler-Gross of the Office of Energy Intelligence (OEI) regarding the Appellant's grievance action.

In order to determine the validity of the Appellant's claim we spoke with an OEI official who has personal knowledge of the search for responsive documents in this case. That official informed us that he had personally discussed this matter with Ms. Butler-Gross. Memorandum of March 13, 1997, Telephone Conversation between Edward McGinnis, OEI, and Steven Fine, OHA. That official indicated that Ms. Butler-Gross had emphatically denied ever receiving any written statements concerning the Appellant's grievance proceeding from any third party, including Ms. Ruhnow.

If a requester has reasonably described the information he or she is seeking and has complied with the DOE's FOIA regulations appearing at 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, the agency is obliged to conduct a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. United States Dep't of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1385 (8th Cir. 1985); accord, Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

We find that the OEI official's discussion with the individual who, the appellant claims, received the document in question fulfilled the DOE's obligation to conduct a reasonable search for responsive documents. Under the circumstances, DOE's failure to locate the document to which the appellant refers was not erroneous. Accordingly, we have determined that this Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Daniel J. Bruno on March 7, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0277) is hereby denied.

April 4, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Glen Milner

Case Number: VFA-0278

On March 7, 1997, Glen Milner (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on February 12, 1997, by the Freedom of Information Officer at the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (DOE/AL). That determination followed the remand from this Office of a case in which the Appellant had appealed a previous determination by the DOE/AL. See Glen Milner, 26 DOE ¶ 80,147 (1996) (Milner). The previous determination by DOE/AL had denied the Appellant's request for a fee waiver with regard to a request for information he submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In Milner, a partial fee waiver was granted. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be ordered to conduct an additional search and release additional documents under that fee waiver.

I. Background

In a March 22, 1996 FOIA request, the Appellant sought information generated since 1985 pertaining to specially fitted railcars for the transport of nuclear weapons.(1) In May 8, 1996 and October 7, 1996 determinations, DOE/AL denied the Appellant's request for a fee waiver or alternative fee arrangements.

The Appellant appealed, and in the Milner Decision and Order issued on December 23, 1996, this Office found that a fee waiver should be granted to the Appellant, but only for "documents generated from 1992 until the completion of the search that concern specially fitted railcars for the transport of nuclear weapons." Milner, 26 DOE at 80,650. On remand, DOE/AL determined that it possessed only one responsive document. Although not required to do so, it also summarized for the Appellant what it had learned regarding the railcars.(2) Letter from Elva Ann Barfield, Freedom of Information Officer, DOE/AL to Glen Milner (February 12, 1997) (Determination Letter). The Appellant subsequently filed the present Appeal in which he contends that the search for responsive documents was inadequate. Letter from Glen Milner to Director, OHA (March 7, 1997) (Appeal Letter).(3)

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., James H. Stebbings, 25 DOE ¶ 80,177 (1996); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980).

The Appellant makes several arguments in support of his assertion that additional responsive documents must exist. First, the Appellant argues that DOE/AL must have only looked for documents generated after 1992, not in the year 1992 itself. Second, the Appellant believes that the document he was sent was part of another document and requests identification of both the document he was sent and its source document. Third, the Appellant claims that DOE/AL only searched for documents concerning shipping the railcars to Russia, instead of all post-1991 documents dealing with the railcars. Fourth, the Appellant does not believe that DOE/AL searched for documents generated as close to the present date as possible. Fifth, the Appellant notes that the specially fitted railcars have been observed standing in Texas and he therefore believes that documents explaining that fact must exist.

We have examined each of the Appellant's arguments carefully and make the following determinations. First, DOE/AL guessed that perhaps as many as 500 documents concerning the railcars have been generated by the DOE or DOE contractors since 1992. However, it chose to send only the document it felt most clearly explained why the railcars had not gone to Russia. It stated that this document was part of an internal DOE newsletter on operational and physical security which appeared in January 1993. The remainder of the newsletter concerned topics wholly unrelated to the railcars.(4) See March 14th Telephone Memorandum.

This type of extremely restricted search is not what was contemplated in the fee waiver granted in Milner. Our decision clearly granted a fee waiver for all "documents generated from 1992 until the completion of the search that concern specially fitted railcars for the transport of nuclear weapons." Milner, 26 DOE at 80,650. Thus, a search for the additional responsive documents referred to in the March 14th telephone memorandum is necessary.(5) Furthermore, because we were informed in the March 14th telephone conversation that no search had yet been conducted for responsive documents, on remand DOE/AL should search for responsive documents from January 1992 until the date it starts work on this matter on remand. See Thomas P. Koenigs, 26 DOE ¶ 80,131 at 80,577 (1996) (search beyond the normal cutoff, date of request, is appropriate "[w]hen a requester seeks current data and the agency's response is substantially delayed").

Finally, in response to the Appellant's request regarding the current status of the railcars, we note that under the FOIA, agencies are not required to answer questions, but instead are required only to release non-exempt, responsive documents. DiViaio v. Kelley, 571 F.2d 538, 542-43 (10th Cir. 1978). However, in the March 14th telephone conversation, we learned that while the dismantlement process has been slowed by the processing of the railcars under the National Historic Preservation Act, Mr. Richey believes that the dismantlement should be complete within six to nine months.

In conclusion, we find that DOE/AL improperly restricted its search. On remand, DOE/AL shall identify all documents responsive to the Appellant's request and for which a fee waiver was granted, and either release them or provide adequate justification for withholding any portion of them.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Glen Milner on March 7, 1997, Case Number VFA-0278, is granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Albuquerque Operations Office, which shall conduct a search for documents responsive to the Appellant's request and for which a fee waiver was previously granted as described in the above Decision and Order, and shall promptly issue a new determination regarding the result of that search.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

George B. Breznay

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: April 4, 1997

(1)In the March 22 request, the Appellant noted that in 1992 then U.S. Secretary of State James Baker announced that the railcars would be sent to Russia for use in the disarmament of nuclear weapons by that country. The Appellant also stated that since reading several articles describing that plan, he had not heard whether the railcars had been sent and wished to know if they had been sent, and if not, what had happened to them.

(2)DOE/AL had learned that the plan to send the railcars to Russia had been discarded as being infeasible and that the railcars were currently being dismantled. Further, it had learned that the State Department originally made the offer to provide the railcars to Russia, but eventually agreed with Russian officials that the plan was infeasible. Thus, additional responsive documents may exist at the State Department. See Records of Telephone Conversations between Richard Richey, Chief of Engineering, Transportation Safety Division, DOE/AL, and Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (March 18 and 19, 1997). The Appellant may make an additional FOIA request to that agency.

(3)The Appellant is only appealing the adequacy of DOE/AL's search for documents for which he was granted a fee waiver. It appears that he has not pursued the remainder of his original request, i.e. for the railcar documents generated before 1992, for which no fee waiver was granted.

(4)The article, while reproduced by DOE/AL on two pages, contained the notations "continued on page 2" and "continued on page 3." This article was photocopied from the three pages it occupied in the newsletter and was shrunk to fit two pages. The entire article was reproduced for the Appellant. Record of Telephone Conversation between Jim Snyder, Office of Public Affairs and Richard Richey, both of DOE/AL, and Dawn Goldstein (March 14, 1997) (March 14th telephone memorandum).

(5)In the March 14th telephone conversation, we were informed that DOE contractors AlliedSignal Corporation and Mason & Hanger Corporation possess many of these documents. We note that a search for these documents must be conducted, and as required under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3, any of these documents which are responsive and owned by DOE must be identified and are subject to mandatory release unless exempt.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Robert B. Freeman

Case Number: VFA-0279

On March 21, 1997, Robert B. Freeman filed an Appeal from a determination issued on February 13, 1997, by the Western Area Power Administration (WAPA). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008.

The Privacy Act requires each federal agency to, inter alia, permit an individual to gain access to information about that individual which is contained in any "system of records" maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d); 10 C.F.R. § 1008.6(a)(2). Also relevant to the present appeal is the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On January 27, 1997, Mr. Freeman requested from WAPA documents "related to an adverse determination made by James Biggs [a WAPA manager] in a questionable fitness for duty matter." Letter from Robert B. Freeman to J.M. Schafer, WAPA (Jan. 27, 1997). Specifically, Mr. Freeman requested, inter alia, information provided by WAPA to a psychologist, Dr. Torres, and a psychiatrist, Dr. Kendall, who evaluated Mr. Freeman, as well as the "complete raw data and test results" from both doctors' evaluations. Id.

WAPA issued a determination on February 13, 1997, in which it released certain information responsive to Mr. Freeman's request. Letter from Michael L. Watkins, Privacy Act Officer, WAPA, to Robert B. Freeman (Feb. 13, 1997). However, WAPA withheld several documents in their entirety, citing provisions of the Privacy Act and DOE regulations that exempt from disclosure "information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1008.9(a)(2). WAPA also withheld the raw data and test results from both doctors' evaluations. The Privacy Act authorizes federal agencies to establish a "special procedure, if deemed necessary, for the disclosure to an individual of medical records, including psychological records, pertaining to him." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(f)(3). The applicable DOE procedure is set forth at 10 C.F.R. § 1008.8(c)-(e). The Privacy Act officer stated in WAPA's determination:

Both Dr. Torres and Dr. Kendall have strongly recommended that information pertaining to Dr. Torres' evaluation not be provided to you.

It is my understanding that you have provided your manager with the name of a physician . . . . Upon verification of the physician's identity, the documents will be made available to the physician, who will then have full authority to disclose the documents to you.

Letter from Michael L. Watkins, WAPA, to Robert B. Freeman at 2.

Upon receiving Mr. Freeman's Appeal, we contacted the Appellant by telephone. He told us that medical records were released to his designated physician and were read to him, but that he never obtained physical possession of the documents. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Robert Freeman and Steven Goering, OHA (Apr. 1, 1997). After we contacted WAPA to inquire about this, WAPA contacted the physician, who then released these documents to Mr. Freeman. However, Mr. Freeman stated that his physician never received certain materials from Dr. Torres, such as diagnostic tests performed on him. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Robert Freeman and Steven Goering, OHA (Apr. 4, 1997).

II. Analysis

A. Material Provided by WAPA to Dr. Torres

The Privacy Act exempts from release "any information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(5). The exemption "is not limited to an attorney's work product, but extends to any records compiled by counsel or other persons in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." Hernandez v. Alexander, 671 F.2d 402, 408 (10th Cir. 1982) (citing Smiertka v. Department of Treasury, 447 F. Supp. 221, 227-28 (D.D.C. 1978)).

In the present case, WAPA withheld certain information from Mr. Freeman that it states was "prepared in reasonable anticipation of a civil action and/or administrative proceedings between [WAPA] and the American Federation of Government Employees." The withheld documents consist of printed electronic mail and draft memoranda dated from July through September 1996, and pertaining to a decision by WAPA in September 1996 to eliminate one helicopter from its fleet. In its response to the present Appeal, WAPA provided copies of two unfair labor practice charges that were filed in October 1996 by the American Federation of Government Employees (AFGE). At issue in one of these cases is WAPA's decision to eliminate one helicopter (which had been flown by the Appellant) without first entering into negotiations with AFGE. The other charge relates to an earlier decision by a WAPA manager to remove the Appellant from flight duty. These charges were filed with the Federal Labor Relations Authority (FLRA), and are currently under investigation. WAPA advises us that, depending on the outcome of the investigation, these charges could result in a hearing before the FLRA.

We do not agree with WAPA that the documents at issue were compiled "in reasonable anticipation" of a civil action or proceeding. The federal courts offer us scant guidance in interpreting the meaning of the phrase "in reasonable anticipation" as it is used in the Privacy Act. However, in applying the attorney work product privilege, the courts have often had to determine whether documents are prepared in anticipation of litigation and are thus protected by the privilege. And it is clear from those cases that documents qualify for the privilege only if the anticipation of litigation was at least one factor in the decision to compile the documents. Indeed, several courts have found that in order for the privilege to apply the anticipation of litigation must be "the primary motivating purpose behind the creation of the document." United States v. Rockwell Int'l, 897 F.2d 1255, 1266 (3d Cir. 1990); United States v. Gulf Oil Corp., 760 F.2d 292, 296 (Temp. Emer. Ct. App. 1985); Binks Mfg. Co. v. National Presto Indus., 709 F.2d 1109, 1119 (7th Cir. 1983) (quoting Janicker v. George Washington Univ., 94 F.R.D. 648, 650 (D.D.C. 1982)); United States v.

El Paso Co., 682 F.2d 530, 542 (5th Cir. 1982); see also C. Wright, A. Miller & E. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2024 (1994) ("[T]he test should be whether, in light of the nature of the document and the factual situation in the particular case, the document can fairly be said to have been prepared or obtained because of the prospect of litigation."). This interpretation, as applied to the Privacy Act, is in accord with guidance issued by the Office of Management and Budget shortly after the enactment of the Act. Responsibilities for the Maintenance of Records About Individuals by Federal Agencies, 40 Fed. Reg. 28948, 28960 (July 9, 1975) ("[T]he purpose of the compilation governs the applicability of [subsection (d)(5)].")

It is true that the documents at issue were all prepared between one week and three months before the AFGE's charges were filed, and all relate to either WAPA's decision to eliminate the helicopter from its fleet or the WAPA manager's decision to remove the Appellant from flight duty. Because a primary issue discussed with the AFGE at the time concerned whether WAPA's decision needed to be negotiated with the union beforehand, it was entirely reasonable for WAPA to anticipate that, once its decision was made, AFGE would file an unfair labor practice charge. Moreover, these documents were later compiled and provided to one of the doctors who evaluated Mr. Freeman to determine his fitness to fly. Thus, the documents were both created and later compiled as part of a decision-making process that quickly led to reasonably anticipated charges against the agency. However, we have no reason to believe that the documents in question were generated because of WAPA's anticipation of those charges being filed. Rather, we believe that the documents would have been created as part of the decision-making process whether or not WAPA anticipated that the decision finally taken would lead to a civil action or proceeding. We therefore find that these documents may not be withheld under subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act.

Moreover, even if a Privacy Act exemption were properly invoked by WAPA, information that is exempt from disclosure under the Privacy Act must be released to a requester unless it is also exempt from disclosure under the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(t)(2). Thus, it is the general practice of the DOE to process a request by an individual for information about that individual under both the Privacy Act and the FOIA. Even if, as in the present case, a requester specifically requests records under the Privacy Act, it well serves administrative efficiency and the requester to process the request under the FOIA as well, rather than requiring the requester to file a separate FOIA request for the same records. Accordingly, we will remand this case to WAPA for a new determination either releasing the information withheld under subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act, or explaining why the information is otherwise exempt under the Privacy Act and also exempt under the FOIA.(1)

B. Records in the Possession of Dr. Torres Not Provided to the Appellant

As we stated above, Mr. Freeman has requested certain records related to Dr. Torres' evaluation that have not yet been provided to him. Our threshold inquiry regarding these records is whether they are subject to the FOIA. First, we must determine whether such records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). Finally, we must determine whether these documents are contained in a "system of records," and thus subject to the Privacy Act. After reviewing this matter, for the reasons stated below we conclude that the records in question are not subject to the FOIA or the Privacy Act, and are not subject to release under DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information required to be made available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-stage analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by entities that contract with the DOE are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., B.M.F. Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the entity is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA, and if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether an entity should be regarded as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case which involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an entity will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba- Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976). Because the structure and daily operations of Dr. Torres' practice are not subject to substantial federal control, it is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although Dr. Torres' medical practice is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, his records responsive to Mr. Freeman's request could become "agency records" if they were obtained by the DOE and were within the DOE's control at the time the FOIA request was made. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, the documents in question had not been obtained by the DOE and were not in the agency's control at the time of the Appellant's request.(2)

Even if a document fails to qualify as an "agency record," it may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and an outside party provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE FOIA regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

In the present case, there was no written or oral agreement between the DOE and Dr. Torres that any records generated by Dr. Torres would be the property of the Government. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ronald Klinefelter, WAPA, and Steve Goering, OHA (Apr. 10, 1997). Because the records in question are not the property of the Government, they are not subject to release under the DOE regulations. Thus, we find that the medical records in the possession of Dr. Torres sought by the Appellant are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA, nor subject to release under DOE regulations.

In order to be subject to release under the Privacy Act, the records in questions would have to be contained in a "system of records," which the Act defines as "a group of any records under the control of any agency from which information is retrieved by the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particular assigned to the individual." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(a)(5). As we have already established above, the records sought by Mr. Freeman that are in the custody of Dr. Torres have never been under the control of the DOE. Therefore, they are not contained in a "system of records" subject to the Privacy Act.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we will grant Mr. Freeman's Appeal to the extent that we will remand this matter to WAPA to process the Appellant's request under both the Privacy Act and the FOIA. On remand, WAPA should issue a new determination releasing to Mr. Freeman the material it provided to Dr. Torres that is not exempt under both the FOIA and the Privacy Act. Further, WAPA should withhold exempt information only if it reasonably foresees that disclosure would be harmful to an interest protected by the relevant exemption under the FOIA. In all other respects, the present Appeal will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Robert B. Freeman on March 21, 1997, Case Number VFA-0279, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Western Area Power Administration, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(1) Segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary where it is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material so that release of the non-exempt material would "compromise" the withheld material, or where the amount of non-exempt material is small and so interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate. Lead Indus. Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

(2) Segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary where it is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material so that release of the non-exempt material would "compromise" the withheld material, or where the amount of non-exempt material is small and so interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate. Lead Indus. Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

(3) Dr. Torres did send copies of certain medical records to WAPA, but these were copies of the records that Dr. Torres forwarded to Dr. Kendall, which were in turn provided to Mr. Freeman's designated physician, and which have now been provided to Mr. Freeman. Memoranda of telephone conversations between Ronald Klinefelter, WAPA, and Steve Goering, OHA (Apr. 7, 1997, and Apr. 9, 1997). Thus, although these records qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts, they have already been provided to the Appellant.

April 17, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Information Focus on Energy, Inc.

Case Number:VFA-0280

On March 24, 1997, Information Focus on Energy, Inc. (IFE) filed an Appeal from a February 18, 1997 determination by the Assistant Inspector General for Resource Management (Assistant IG) of the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the Assistant IG partially granted a request for information filed by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, IFE asks that we order a new search for responsive documents.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest and not contrary to other laws. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information, IFE sought copies of documents containing "[t]he titles, report numbers, and issue dates of all DOE Inspector General Reports, including inspection reports, for the years 1988 through September, 1996." In the February 18, 1997 determination letter, the Assistant IG enclosed copies of listings for all audit reports, including "investigative and inspection reports that have a public distribution." The Assistant IG also stated that her office did not maintain lists of investigative and inspection reports. Furthermore, the Assistant IG noted that the FOIA does not require the compilation or creation of a record for the purpose of satisfying a request for records.

In its appeal, IFE argues that its request did not ask the Assistant IG to create a list of investigative and inspection reports. IFE contends that the Assistant IG should have in its files releasable copies of title pages of these reports. IFE also states that the Assistant IG only identified documents available for "public distribution." Based on the Assistant IG's statement in the determination letter, IFE infers that the Assistant IG has additional inspection reports and audits that she is improperly withholding.

II. Analysis

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted the Assistant IG to ascertain the validity of IFE's contention that there exist title pages of unidentified reports and that the Assistant IG did not identify in her determination letter other documents responsive to IFE's request.(1) An official in the Assistant IG's office informed us that the IG's office has additional investigative and inspection reports not included in the compilation lists sent to IFE. Some of these reports have title pages. Furthermore, the official confirmed that the Assistant IG did not identify all of the documents responsive to IFE's request. The Assistant IG only identified those documents available for "public distribution." Since the scope of the FOIA is not limited to documents that have previously been made available to the public, the Assistant IG must conduct a search for all responsive documents, including those that are not for "public distribution." If the Assistant IG finds that responsive material contained in those documents is withholdable pursuant to the FOIA, she should identify these documents and cite the appropriate FOIA exemption. Accordingly, we will remand this matter to the Assistant IG to either release the "titles, report numbers, and issue dates of all DOE Inspector General Reports, including inspection reports, for the years 1988 through September, 1996" or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Information Focus on Energy, Inc. on March 24, 1997 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Assistant Inspector General for Resource Management of the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Energy to search for and release documents containing titles, report numbers, and issue dates of all DOE Inspector General Reports, including inspection reports, for the years 1988 through September 1996 or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

April 25, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Information Focus on Energy, Inc.

Case Number: VFA-0281

Information Focus on Energy, Inc. (IFOE) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on February 28, 1997 by the Department of Energy's FOIA/Privacy Act Division (DOE/HQ). In that determination, DOE/HQ denied a request for information that IFOE filed on October 22, 1996 pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. IFOE was denied access to the records contained in the DOE Occurrence Reporting and Processing System (ORPS) operated by the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory for the DOE Office of Environment, Safety and Health. This Appeal, if granted, would require DOE/HQ to release the information that it withheld in the February 28, 1997 determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On October 22, 1996, Robert Keller of IFOE(1) submitted a request under the FOIA to DOE for "[a]ccess to the DOE Occurrence Reporting and Processing System operated by the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory for the DOE Office of Environment, Safety and Health. Only access to records designated as not containing classified or other sensitive information is requested." See Letter from IFOE to FOI Officer, DOE/HQ (October 22, 1996). DOE/HQ referred the request to the Office of Operating Experience Analysis and Feedback (DOE/EH).

ORPS is a database containing over 30,000 final and nonfinal (2) occurrence reports submitted by field offices. Events such as injuries and accidents (or anything considered newsworthy by site personnel) are reported to ORPS in a notification report. These reports are finalized within 45 days and sent to the local public reading room, then to DOE/HQ, where the final reports are kept in the headquarters public reading room for 2 years. Some records in the ORPS database have been determined to be unclassified controlled nuclear information (UCNI). DOE/EH gave DOE/HQ the material it found responsive--a diskette containing a list of the title of each final occurrence report categorized at the unusual or emergency level, the facility where the occurrence took place, the report number, the discovery date, and the report date. The list did not include reports containing UCNI or classified information.

DOE/HQ reviewed the request and took the position that IFOE had requested access to the ORPS database itself and not to the records contained in ORPS. DOE/HQ then informed IFOE that "[t]he FOIA allows for access to agency records that exist, not to government computing systems that require other procedures to permit access to the database in those systems." See Letter from Director, FOIA/Privacy Act Division, DOE/HQ, to IFOE (February 28, 1997). Therefore, DOE/HQ denied the request but enclosed the diskette with the determination letter.

On March 24, 1997, IFOE appealed the denial. IFOE claimed that denial of its request violated a DOE order stating Department policy to encourage a positive attitude toward reporting occurrences. See Letter from IFOE to Director, OHA (March 24, 1997) [hereinafter Appeal Letter] at 2. In addition, IFOE alleges that it is not requesting access to government computer systems, but rather "access to the electronic records on a timely basis, such as by downloading from a publicly available Worldwide Web site." Id.

II. Analysis

IFOE raises two issues in its appeal. First, it appeals DOE/HQ's interpretation of the scope of its request. Second, IFOE alleges that denial of its appeal is contrary to the electronic record provisions of the 1996 amendments to the Freedom of Information Act.

A. Scope of the Request

"The FOIA generally provides that any person has a right, enforceable in court, of access to federal agency records . . .." Justice Department Guide To the Freedom of Information Act, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (September 1996) (emphasis added) at 3. The FOIA applies to "records" maintained by "agencies" within the executive branch of the federal government. Id. at 12. Thus, DOE/HQ is correct when it states in its final response to IFOE that the FOIA does not provide for access to agency databases. However, DOE/EH interpreted the request as a request for access to the records within the database, and we agree with this interpretation. In an attempt to be responsive given the large volume of material in the database, DOE/EH gave DOE/HQ a list of the titles of final reports in the database and recommended that DOE/HQ release the list to the requester as responsive material. That list was released.

The requester alleges that DOE/HQ has interpreted its request too narrowly. We agree, and find that it should have interpreted the request as a request for access to the records contained in the ORPS database. In our analysis of this case, we reviewed a sample nonfinal occurrence report (3) that was printed from the database. On the basis of that review, we find that nonfinal reports should have been identified as responsive to IFOE's request. However, although the nonfinal reports contain factual material, they also contain information that appears to be predecisional and deliberative. We conclude that Exemption 5 may apply to this data, as may other FOIA exemptions. Accordingly, we grant this portion of the appeal and remand this matter to DOE/HQ so that the nonfinal reports may be reviewed to determine if they contain any non-exempt, releasable data. (4)

B. Request for Electronic Records

IFOE asks in its appeal that it be given access to nonclassified, nonsensitive, nonfinal reports (5) in a timely fashion via the Internet. Appeal Letter at 2-3. The requester alleges that denial of this request is contrary to the 1996 FOIA amendments found in Public Law 104-231. Id. We do not agree. Although the 1996 FOIA amendments mandate that records be made available to the public electronically via a website by November 2, 1997, as of this date, there is no website for ORPS records. Therefore, documents do not exist in the format that IFOE desires, i.e., they are not available on the Internet. Accordingly, we deny this portion of the appeal and find that DOE/HQ is not required under the FOIA to reproduce ORPS records in electronic format on the Internet in response to this appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Information Focus On Energy, Inc. on March 24, 1997, Case Number VFA-0281, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the FOIA/Privacy Act Division, which shall review the request for nonclassified, nonsensitive, nonfinal occurrence reports, and segregate and release non-exempt portions of these reports or issue a new determination adequately justifying continued non-disclosure of this information.

George B. Breznay

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: April 27, 1997

(1)IFOE publishes a newsletter on issues related to commercial and governmental uses of nuclear materials.

(2)Nonfinal occurrence reports reflect the analysis, opinions and recommendations of DOE contractors with direct line responsibility for operation of a facility. These nonfinal reports also contain comments and concerns identified in a review performed by the responsible DOE field office and program office.

(3)Completion of a nonfinal report is the first step in a notification system. Occurrences in the field must be reported to ORPS via a nonfinal report within 24 hours of the event, usually before a thorough investigation of the event can be completed. Thus, data in the report is often inaccurate and the final report of the event may be radically different from the nonfinal report.

(4)Although not required under the FOIA, in view of the thousands of records in the database, it may be beneficial for the requester and DOE if DOE first produces an index of any records found responsive in the same format as the final report listing previously released to IFOE. This index might assist IFOE in selecting the information it would like to obtain, and thus obviate DOE's burden to produce redacted versions of all nonfinal reports.

(5)IFOE noted that the diskette included only emergency level events. DOE/EH is willing to provide the requester with an additional list of lower level final occurrence reports.

April 25, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Richard Levernier

Case Number: VFA-0282

On March 26, 1997, Richard J. Levernier (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued to him on February 28, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (IG). In that determination, the IG released copies of 26 responsive documents in their entirety, withheld 27 documents in their entirety and released an additional 158 responsive documents from which information had been deleted. This partial release occurred in response to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information, and conduct an additional search for responsive documents.

I. BACKGROUND

On February 28, 1997, the IG issued a determination letter in response to two requests submitted by the Appellant. The first request (#93122201G) sought all information relating to him as the subject of an IG investigation. Determination Letter at 1. The second request (#RF94-054) sought ". . . any ?records,' including tape recordings, written transcripts or summaries, of recordings of telephone conversations between [him] and Wackenhut Services, Inc.-Rocky Flats Plant (WSI-RFP) personnel." Id. The determination letter released 26 documents in their entirety. However, the Determination letter also withheld 27 documents in their entirety as well as portions of 158 other documents under Exemptions 5, 6, 7(C) and 7(D). (1) On March 26, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, challenging these withholdings. In addition, the Appellant contends that the IG's search for responsive documents was inadequate because it failed to locate and identify documents located in the files of the former Office of Contractor Employee Protection (OCEP).

II. ANALYSIS

A. Adequacy of the Search

If a requester has reasonably described the information he or she is seeking and has complied with the DOE's FOIA regulations appearing at 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, the agency is obliged to conduct a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1385 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984); see also Oglesby v. Department of the Army, 920 F.2d 57, 68 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (and cases cited therein).

The Appellant alleges that the IG's search for responsive documents was inadequate because it did not recover any files from OCEP. At the time when the Appellant filed the requests for information at issue in the present case, OCEP was not part of the IG. The Appellant had filed a separate request with OCEP. In response to that request, OCEP issued a determination letter on March 31, 1994 which released to him all documents in its possession that were responsive to his request. Accordingly, the IG was not required to include OCEP's files in its search for documents responsive to the present requests. However, the IG searched the files again and found no responsive documents that had not already been provided to the Appellant. For these reasons, we find that the Appellant has not shown that IG's search for documents responsive to FOIA requests #93122201G and #RF94-054 was inadequate.

B. Whether the IG's Withholdings Were Proper

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Exemptions 5, 6, 7(C) and 7(D) are at issue in the present case.

1. Withholdings under Exemption 5

The IG withheld one document in its entirety (Document 172) and portions of an additional six documents (Documents 6, 104, 120, 125, 132 and 180) under Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege. Exemption 5 protects "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party … in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). The language of Exemption 5 has been construed to "exempt those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in a civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears).

Courts have recognized several privileges incorporated into Exemption 5, including the deliberative process privilege. To fall within the scope of the deliberative process privilege, a document must be: (1) predecisional, that is, antecedent to the adoption of an agency policy; and (2) deliberative, that is, recommending or expressing an opinion on legal or policy matters. Mapother v. Department of Justice, 3 F.3d 1533, 1537 (D.C. Cir. 1993); Petroleum Info. Corp. v. United States Dep't of the Interior, 976 F.2d 1429, 1434 (D.C. Cir. 1992); Jordan v. United States Dep't of Justice, 591 F.2d 753, 774 (D.C. Cir. 1978); Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136, 1143-44 (D.C. Cir. 1975); See also Benedetto Enterprises, Inc., 19 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1989); Darci L. Rock, 13 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1985).

This privilege was developed primarily to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making government decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (Mink) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Cl. Ct. 1958)). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of the agency decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id.

Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. The FOIA, as implemented by 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(c), requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). The only exceptions to the command of segregation are where exempt and non-exempt material are so "inextricably intertwined" that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the exempt material, Lead Industries Assoc., Inc. v.

Occupational Safety and Health Admin., 610 F.2d 70, 85 (2d Cir. 1979), or where non-exempt material is so small and interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate it. Id.

In order to review the IG's withholdings under Exemption 5, we obtained copies of a representative sample of the documents it withheld under Exemption 5 (Documents 104, 120, 132, 172 and 180) from the IG. Our review of these documents has revealed that these documents contain some information which is strictly factual in nature. Accordingly, we find that IG had failed to properly segregate factual material from the information it withheld under Exemption 5.

Moreover, our review indicates that the IG has withheld more information than necessary to ensure that its deliberative process would not be revealed. Accordingly, we are remanding this portion of the Appeal to the IG. On remand, the IG should review all the information it has withheld in all seven documents under the deliberative process privilege in order to determine if it is both predecisional and deliberative. In addition, the IG must segregate and release any factual information contained in the withheld portions of those document that are not inextricably intertwined with withheld information. The IG must then issue a new determination letter in which it releases this information, withholds it under other applicable FOIA exemptions, or better explains why it considers the information to be predecisional and deliberative.

In our view, release of the vast majority of the information withheld under Exemption 5 in these documents would pose no tangible risk to interests protected under the FOIA. Accordingly, we find that the IG must review all of its withholdings under Exemption 5 to ensure that they are appropriate under the "reasonably foreseeable harm" standard set forth by the Attorney General in 1993. This standard applies a presumption in favor of disclosure which, in the absence of a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by an exemption, should result in a determination by the agency that the public interest lies with disclosure. See J. Reno, Memorandum for Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993). On remand, after properly segregating and releasing factual material, the IG should consider the possibility of releasing some or all of the Exemption 5 material in light of this standard.

2. Exemptions 6 & 7(C)

The IG withheld approximately 26 documents in their entirety and portions of numerous other documents under Exemptions 6 and 7(C) claiming that release of the withheld information would reveal the identities of potential witnesses, informants and confidential sources. The Appellant generally contends that the IG improperly applied these exemptions.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Williams v. IRS, 479 F.2d 317, 318 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom. Donolon v. IRS, 414 U.S. 1024 (1973). By law, the IG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. The IG is therefore a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate. Ortiz v. U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, 70 F.3d 729, 732-33 (2nd Cir. 1995) (Ortiz) ("An Inspector General of a federal government agency engages in law enforcement activities within the meaning of FOIA") and cases cited therein. In the present case, the IG's investigatory actions were clearly within this statutory mandate.

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

We have previously considered cases in which both Exemption 6 and 7(C) were invoked, and we stated that in such cases, provided the Exemption 7 threshold of law enforcement purpose is met, we would analyze the withholding only under Exemption 7(C), the broader of the two exemptions. See, e.g., K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1992); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1991); James E. Phelps, 20 DOE ¶ 80,169 (1990); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,109 (1990); Jerry O. Campbell, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988). Since all of the documents involved here were compiled for law enforcement purposes, any document that satisfies Exemption 7(C)'s "reasonableness" standard will be protected. Conversely, documents not protected by Exemption 7(C) will be unable to satisfy Exemption 6's more restrictive requirement that they constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

(1) Privacy Interest

Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals providing information to government investigators. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (KTVY-TV) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985) (Cucarro); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,524 (1990). Accordingly, we find that the individuals whose identities are being withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

(2) Public Interest in Disclosure

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 109 S. Ct. at 1481-84. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 1483. Therefore, the Court held, only that information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989); cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

It is well settled that disclosure of the identity of individuals who have provided information to government investigators is not "affected with the public interest." See, e.g., Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1205; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469. In the absence of a compelling reason for deviating from this body of precedent, we reach that conclusion in the present case.

(3) The Balancing Test

Because release of the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to subject them to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Our findings are consistent with those reached by several appellate courts. When presented with a similar set of facts, these courts have found that the privacy interests of individuals supplying information to government investigators clearly outweigh the negligible public interest in disclosure of these individuals' identities. See, e.g., Safecard; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469 (finding withholding necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro, 770 F.2d at 359.

Among the information withheld by the IG in order to protect the identity of individuals whose names appear in IG's files were some recordings and transcripts of telephone conversations that the Appellant had participated in. Because release of these transcripts could reasonably be expected to reveal the identity of an individual or individuals that provided information to the IG, we find that the IG properly withheld these documents in their entirety under Exemptions 6 and 7(C).

3. Exemption 7(D)

The IG has withheld six documents under Exemption 7(D), claiming that: (1) release of this information would reveal confidential sources, or (2) the information was supplied by confidential sources. Determination Letter at 2. Exemption 7(D) allows for the withholding of "Records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes [which] could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source . . . [or] information furnished by a confidential source." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D) (1994). "Exemption 7(D) is meant to (1) protect confidential sources from retaliation that may result from the disclosure of their participation in law enforcement activities, see Brant Construction v. United States EPA, 778 F.2d 1258, 1262 (7th Cir. 1985), and (2) ?encourage cooperation with law enforcement agencies by enabling the agencies to keep their informants' identities confidential.' United Technologies Corp. v. NLRB, 777 F.2d 90, 94 (2d Cir. 1985)." Ortiz v. U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services, 70 F.3d 729, 732 (2nd Cir. 1995) (Ortiz). As the court stated in Ortiz: "[A] source is confidential within the meaning of Exemption 7(D) if the source ?provided information under an express assurance of confidentiality or in circumstances from which such an assurance could be reasonably inferred.'" Id. Citing United States v. Landano, 508 U.S. 165; 113 S.Ct. 2014, 2019 (1993). Accordingly, we find that the information withheld by the IG under this exemption was properly withheld.

III. CONCLUSION

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about the DOE, we are also concerned about preserving the privacy rights of individuals whose identities are contained in IG's files. By releasing the responsive documents with only those withholdings necessary to prevent identification of specific individuals, the agency can provide as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights and safety.

For the reasons set forth above, we have found that the Office of Inspector General's search for responsive documents was adequate and that its withholdings under Exemptions 6, 7(C) and 7(D) were appropriate. However, we are remanding a portion of this Appeal to the IG for further consideration of the applicability of Exemption 5 as set forth above.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Richard Levernier on March 26, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0282) is hereby granted in part as set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of Inspector General for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

April 25, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Research Information Services, Inc.

Case Number: VFA-0283

On March 27, 1997, Research Information Services, Inc. (RIS), filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on February 26, 1997, by the Nuclear Transfer and Supplier Policy Division of the Office of Arms Control and Nonproliferation (OACN) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned a remand of a RIS Appeal of a previous OACN determination concerning a request for information submitted by RIS pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, OACN would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material and to prepare a list identifying the documents responsive to the request.

I. Background

In its original, July 26, 1996 request, RIS sought all information pertaining to determinations by the Secretary of Energy under 10 C.F.R. Part 810, concerning the People's Republic of China (PRC). Part 810 consisted of a series of regulations promulgated by the DOE in order to implement section 57b of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. That section empowers the Secretary of Energy to authorize United States persons to engage directly or indirectly in the production of special nuclear material outside the United States. RIS was particularly interested in information regarding Stone and Webster Engineering Corporation and Westinghouse Electric Corporation (Westinghouse).

On September 25, 1996, OACN issued its determination, stating that the information RIS was requesting was in the Freedom of Information Reading Room because there had been other FOIA inquires for similar records. Determination Letter dated September 25, 1996, from Kenneth N. Luongo, Senior Advisor to the Secretary for Nonproliferation and Policy and Direct of the Office of Arms Control and Nonproliferation, to Heidi M. Strobel, Director, Legal Research, RIS, at 1. Further, OACN informed RIS that some information was not in the Reading Room because (1) it had originated with other Executive Branch agencies and RIS' request had been forwarded to those agencies for a determination, (2) it was classified information and was undergoing a review by the Office of Declassification for a determination of what could be released, or (3) it was withheld under Exemption 4 of the FOIA. Id. at 1-2.

On October 29, 1996, RIS filed an Appeal with this office, claiming that the absence of several categories of responsive documents from the DOE Reading Room is evidence that OACN's search for responsive documents was inadequate. This office issued a Decision and Order on November 27, 1996, ordering that OACN issue a new determination letter. That new determination letter was to specifically identify each document in the DOE's possession that is responsive to RIS' request and indicate whether the document was available in the Reading Room, withheld under Exemption 4, undergoing classification review, or referred to another Executive Branch agency. Finally, for each responsive document the OACN found to have originated with another agency, the determination letter was required to indicate the name of the agency and date on which the request was forwarded to that agency. Research Information Services, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,139, at 80,592 (1996).

On February 26, 1997, OACN issued another determination letter to RIS. This letter included specific listings of documents that originated with the Departments of State, Commerce, and Defense; the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency; and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. It also provided a listing of responsive DOE documents currently undergoing classification review. Determination Letter dated February 26, 1997, from Trisha Dedik, Director, Nuclear Transfer and Supplier Policy Division, Office of Arms Control and Nonproliferation to Heidi M. Strobel, Director, Legal Research, RIS, at 1. The determination letter further stated that all other documents are in the Reading Room as a portion of a file containing Part 810 material that was collected in response to other, almost identical requests that led OACN to place the information in the Reading Room.(1) However, because those documents number in the hundreds, a specific listing was not prepared. Id. at 2. On March 26, 1997, RIS appealed this determination, claiming that DOE has (1) still not searched for and made available all the responsive unclassified, non- exempt agency records at DOE and (2) willfully disregarded the November 27, 1996 Decision and Order by refusing to provide a list of document responsive to RIS' request. Appeal Letter received March 27, 1997, from Heidi M. Strobel, Director, Legal Research, RIS, to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA), at 3.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted OACN to ascertain whether any other documents exist that are responsive to RIS' request. In its first Appeal, RIS indicated that some of the information in the Reading Room led it to believe that OACN was withholding information or had not done a complete search. For example, Westinghouse has a specific authorization that required it to report to DOE twice a year. Only one of those semi-annual reports is in the Reading Room. OACN indicated that the reports contain company-specific, proprietary information and should be withheld under Exemption 4. However, OACN has never justified their withholding to RIS or even indicated that the Westinghouse reports exist. After we spoke with OACN, it requested that we remand the matter so that it can review the semi-annual reports and issue a new determination either fully justifying the withholding of the Westinghouse reports under Exemption 4 or releasing this information. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation dated April 16, 1997, between Janet R. H. Fishman, Attorney-Examiner, OHA, and Jim Kratz, OACN. We have no evidence before us that tends to show that OACN has failed to identify other information responsive to RIS' request. Finally, in respect to RIS' second claim that OACN has not provided a list identifying the documents responsive to its request, OACN is not required to provide a list of information that it is releasing. By making the Part 810 information available in the Reading Room, it has released that information. We will grant RIS' Appeal in part and remand the matter to OACN for a new determination that either justifies the withholding of the semi-annual Westinghouse reports under Exemption 4 or releases the information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on March 27, 1997, by Research Information Services, Inc., Case No. VFA-0283, is hereby granted to the extent provided in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of Arms Control and Nonproliferation for a new determination that either justifies the withholding of the semi-annual reports under Exemption 4 or releases the information.

(1) RIS is requesting Part 810 information about dealings with the PRC. Therefore, some of the information in the Reading Room dealing with other countries would not be responsive. However, the vast majority of Part 810 information deals with the PRC. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation dated April 9, 1997, between Janet R. H. Case No. VFA-0284, 26 DOE ¶ 80,185

May 9, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Burns Concrete, Inc.

Date of Filing: April 3, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0284

On April 3, 1997, Burns Concrete, Inc., (Burns) filed an Appeal from a determination issued on January 30, 1997, by the DOE's Pittsburgh Naval Reactors Office (PNR). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On December 20, 1995, Burns filed a request under the FOIA for documents submitted by Walters Ready Mix, Inc. (Walters) in connection with a purchase order for concrete supplied for the Expanded Core Facility Dry Cell Project at DOE's Bettis Atomic Power Laboratory, Naval Reactors Facility (NRF). This project was terminated in 1993 and Walters submitted the documents sought by Burns as part of a settlement proposal to recover its costs associated with the project. The project was rebid in early 1996, and Walters again filled the purchase order for concrete used in the project.

Because Burns sought information submitted by a third party, PNR sought and received comments on Burns' request from Walters. Letter from Sally B. Pfund and Robert J. Martinez, Williams & Jensen (representing Walters), to James S. Carey, Jr., PNR (April 2, 1996); see Exec. Order No. 12,600, 3 C.F.R. 235 (1988) (requiring notice to submitters). PNR issued a final determination on April 26, 1996. Letter from H.A. Cardinali, Manager, PNR, to Linda Szimhardt, Office Manager, Burns (April 26, 1996). In its determination, PNR released a number of documents in their entirety to Burns, but withheld certain responsive documents and portions of other responsive documents under FOIA Exemption 4, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). Id.

Burns filed an Appeal of PNR's determination on June 17, 1996. Letter from Linda Szimhardt, Burns, to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (June 7, 1996). We granted Burns' Appeal in part and remanded the matter to PNR to issue a new determination releasing additional information to Burns. Burns Concrete, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1996). PNR issued its new determination on January 30, 1997. In its present Appeal, Burns objects to the withholding of certain information in PNR's new determination and challenges the adequacy of PNR's search for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

A. Information Withheld Under Exemption 4

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (a) trade secrets or (b) information that is (1) "commercial" or "financial," (2) "obtained from a person," and (3) "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government under non-voluntary conditions is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (i) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (ii) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 507 U.S. 984 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information that is provided to an agency voluntarily is considered "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879.

Clearly, documents submitted by a company to the DOE in connection with a proposal for reimbursement of costs it incurred are "commercial" within the meaning of Exemption 4 because of the vendor's commercial interest in receiving compensation. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. FDA, 704 F.2d 1280, 1290 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (citing Washington Post Co. v. HHS, 690 F.2d 252, 266 (D.C. Cir. 1982)) (records are commercial so long as the submitter has a "commercial interest" in them). In addition, the information was obtained from a "person," as required by Exemption 4, since corporations are deemed "persons" for purposes of that Exemption. See Allnet Communications Servs. v. FCC, 800 F. Supp. 984, 988 (D.D.C. 1992) ("person" under Exemption 4 "refers to a wide range of entities including corporations"), aff'd, No. 92-5351 (D.C. Cir. May 27, 1994); see also Ronson Management Corp., 19 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1989).

Regarding whether the documents at issue are "confidential," we have held consistently that information submitted in connection with a Request for Proposal is not submitted voluntarily and is therefore to be considered confidential only if it meets the test set out in National Parks. E.g., Glen M. Jameson, 25 DOE ¶ 80,191 (1996). The federal courts have reasoned that even though such submissions are voluntary in the sense that no company is forced to do business with the government, information required by the terms of a Request for Proposal must be submitted if "contractors want to win lucrative government contracts . . . ." McDonnell Douglas Corp v. NASA, No. 91-3134, slip op. at 4 (D.D.C. June 30, 1995).

Similarly in the present case, the documents submitted by Walters were required to be submitted in order for the company to do business in connection with a government project, and specifically in order to receive reimbursement once that project was terminated. Indeed, Walters did not argue, nor did PNR conclude, that the documents at issue were submitted voluntarily. Accordingly, we will find the information at issue to be "confidential" only to the extent that its disclosure is likely either to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the submitter, Walters.

1. Concrete Mix Design Test Data

Some of the information withheld from Burns in PNR's April 26, 1996 determination concerned a mix design, High Density Concrete Mix Design 3500 psi (Trial Batch NX145-1), submitted by Walters for concrete that was to be used in the Dry Cell Project. Burns was provided with the mix design for this concrete, but six pages of testing data were withheld in their entirety and portions of one page of test results were released with certain information redacted. In our decision on Burns' Appeal of PNR's first determination, we concluded that PNR should release to Burns any non-exempt material contained in the documents withheld in their entirety, and should also release additional information from the page partially withheld because this information had been revealed in the mix design already provided to Burns. 26 DOE ¶ 80,143 at 80,600-01.

In its January 30, 1997 determination, PNR released information from each of the seven pages at issue, but withheld certain information from each page under Exemption 4. The information withheld consisted of the results of the laboratory testing of the concrete mix designed by Walters and the results of Walters' measurement of the properties of the blend of aggregate that was used in the mix. Walters contends that this data should be withheld because (1) "Burns intends to use the information to try to affect a recompetition of the project for which the special mix was developed" or could "approach the prime contractor which received the award and underbid Walters for the concrete requirement;" (2) the information "would give Burns an improved position in future competitions . . . in any similar procurements;" and (3) the information was developed at Walters' expense,(1) and releasing this information would allow competitors access to this information without incurring the same expense. Letter from Sally B. Pfund and Robert J. Martinez, Williams & Jensen (representing Walters), to James S. Carey, Jr. (April 2, 1996) at 3-4.

In our previous Appeal decision, we rejected Walters' first argument because we found that the prospect of a rebid of the project or concrete requirement was "extremely unlikely," based on the fact that "the project has now proceeded to the point where it would likely be economically impractical to terminate it." 26 DOE ¶ 80,143 at 80,601. We reject this argument here for the same reason.

Regarding Walters' second and third arguments, we note at the outset that the issue of competitive harm must be resolved on a case-by-case basis. Nonetheless, in interpreting Exemption 4, the federal courts have set forth certain guidelines that can be helpful when carefully applied to the facts of a specific case. For example, a case quite analogous to the present was decided by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Worthington Compressors, Inc. v. Costle, 662 F.2d 45 (D.C. Cir. 1981). Underlying the dispute in Worthington was an Environmental Protection Agency requirement that manufacturers of air compressors provide to the government "test results and design specifications of their products in ?production verification' reports." Id. at 48. One compressor manufacturer requested the data submitted by four competing compressor manufacturers. The court outlined the following analysis necessary to determine the extent of competitive harm caused to a submitter:

The substantial competitive harm test is rather simple to apply in the typical reverse- FOIA case where Government disclosure is the sole means by which competitors can gain access to the requested information. The court considers how valuable the information will be to the requesting competitors and how much this gain will damage the submitter. In this case, however, we have the additional wrinkle that the requested information is available, at some cost, from an additional source. In our view, this requires that the inquiry be expanded to include two considerations: (1) the commercial value of the requested information, and (2) the cost of acquiring the information through other means.

The first consideration is based on the obvious fact that a submitter can suffer competitive harm only if the requested information has commercial value to competitors. When the information does have commercial value, the second consideration comes into play. If the information is freely or cheaply available from other sources, such as reverse engineering, it can hardly be called confidential and agency disclosure is unlikely to cause competitive harm to the submitter. If, on the other hand, competitors can acquire the information only at considerable cost, agency disclosure may well benefit the competitors at the expense of the submitter.

The dimensions of the windfall can be measured by evaluating the commercial practicability of private acquisition of the commercially valuable information. If private reproduction of the information would be so expensive or arcane as to be impracticable, disclosure of that information through the FOIA conduit could damage the competitive position of the submitters, to the advantage of FOIA requesters.

Id. at 51.

Thus, where there is competition in a given industry, the courts have reasoned that release of "proprietary technical information ?would seriously undermine a company's competitive advantage by allowing competitors to have access to ideas and design details that they would not have had or would have had to spend considerable funds to develop on their own.'" SMS Data Prods. Group, Inc. v. Department of the Air Force, No. 88-0481-LFO, slip op. at 3 (D.D.C. March 31, 1989) (citation omitted). We do find that there is competition among concrete companies in Walters' market area, as demonstrated by the fact that Burns competed with Walters on the Dry Cell Project. However, Walters must also demonstrate that there is a "likelihood of substantial competitive harm" in order for the information to be exempt from release. Id. at 530. We cannot find that Walters has made such a showing with respect to the testing results that have been withheld from the appellant.

Applying the method of analysis used by the D.C. Circuit in Worthington, we first must determine whether the "requested information has commercial value to competitors." The appellant contends that the data from tests performed on the mix indicates whether the mix design was reproduced per the values as calculated in the mix design. Consequently, the test results should fall within the same ranges of values as already revealed in the mix design. . . . This test data is always required to be submitted with concrete mix designs to verify the calculated values on the mix design.

Appeal at 2.

We found in our previous Appeal decision that the information contained in the test results can be withheld under Exemption 4 only if that information reveals "properties and characteristics of the special mix beyond that which is revealed by the mix design," the mix design already having been released to the appellant. 26 DOE ¶ 80,143 at 80,601. Based on our review of the specific data withheld from Burns, it is clear that releasing this data would reveal information not provided in the mix design. For example, the mix design alone does not reveal whether the mix, as tested, met the design specifications. The test results do reveal that fact, and more. The testing data indicate the extent to which the mix surpassed or fell short of the specifications. Where data was expected to fall within specified ranges, the test results show precisely where, within or outside of the ranges, the data fall.

This obviously does not end our analysis, however, since we must determine the value of this additional information in the hands of Walters' competitors. Walters argues that the information would bolster Burns' competitive position in future similar procurements by providing "insight into Walters' development process." Letter from Sally B. Pfund and Robert J. Martinez, Williams & Jensen (representing Walters), to James S. Carey, Jr. (April 2, 1996) at 3. However, Walters does not explain how the results of tests on a product already developed, and for which the design specifications have already been released, would provide Burns or any other competitor such insight, nor does the submitter explain how this information "would give Burns an improved position in future competitions . . . in any similar procurements." Conclusory allegations of harm do not suffice to protect information from disclosure under Exemption 4. See Lykes Bros. S.S. Co. v. Pena, No. 92- 2780, slip op. at 13 (D.D.C. Sept. 2, 1993) (Westlaw, DCT database) (submitters "required to make assertions with some level of detail as to the likelihood and the specific nature of the competitive harm they predict"). Without a more detailed explanation of the connection between release of the particular information being withheld and a resulting competitive harm to Walters, we cannot conclude that this information would be valuable to Walters' competitors.

Even if we were to find that the information was of great value, we would then need to determine the cost to Walters' competitors of acquiring the same information through other means. Worthington, 662 F.2d at 51. If the information were "freely or cheaply available from other sources," then we would have to conclude that its release is unlikely to cause Walters substantial competitive harm. Id. If, on the other hand, the information could only be acquired at "considerable cost," or "private reproduction of the information would be so expensive or arcane as to be impracticable, disclosure of that information through the FOIA conduit could damage the competitive position" of Walters. Id. Walters' third argument, that release of the information would allow Burns to produce supporting data "without incurring the cost which Walters has already borne," addresses this issue, but provides us no detail as to the extent of that cost. Thus, we have no way to determine how difficult it would be for Burns or another competitor to acquire this information by running its own tests on the mix design or the aggregate used in that mix.

Because Walter's has not provided a sufficient basis for withholding the information described above, we will remand the testing data portion (pages 187, 188, 189, 191, 192, and 193)(2) of the determination to PNR, with directions to issue a new determination to the appellant. This determination should start with the presumption that the testing data that has been withheld is not exempt from disclosure, absent additional evidence from Walters regarding the substantial competitive harm likely to result from its release. Because Walters provided its comments on this issue to PNR over one year ago, and because at that time Walters was asked to address the release of a larger number of documents, we believe that Walters should now be given an opportunity to provide additional information to PNR to justify withholding the particular information at issue here. However, Walters' comments must specifically address the particular items of information that have been withheld (i.e. slump, % air, wet/dry weights, dry rodded weights, % voids, and bulk specific gravity), and explain in some detail how its competitors would use this particular information in a way that would likely result in substantial competitive harm to Walters. In addition, Walters should provide information as to the cost of running these tests, so that PNR can determine the cost to Walters' competitors of acquiring the testing data from other sources. Finally, we have found that there was information withheld from Burns on one page (page 194) that Burns has demonstrated it has already received. Therefore, this page should be released to the appellant in its entirety.

2. Cost, Profit, and Overhead Data

The vast majority of the data withheld from Burns in PNR's first determination concerned costs incurred by Walters prior to the termination of the Dry Cell Project in 1993. This information was submitted by Walters as part of a settlement proposal to recover its costs associated with the project. When Burns filed its June 1996 Appeal with this office, we reviewed the documents and ordered, inter alia, that on remand non-exempt information contained in three pages that had been withheld in their entirety should be released to Burns. In its January 30, 1997 determination, PNR released these three pages with certain information redacted and withheld from Burns under Exemption 4. In its present Appeal, Burns contends that some of the information withheld should be released.

As we noted in our decision on Burns' previous Appeal, information that, in a competitive market, would reveal the profit rates, general and administrative rates, and actual costs of a competitor company is exempt from release under the FOIA. Gulf & W. Indus., Inc. v. United States, 615 F. 2d 527 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (Gulf & Western). In Gulf & Western, the court found that with such information, the company's "competitors would be able to accurately calculate [the company's] future bids and its pricing structure from the withheld information. The deleted information, if released, would likely cause substantial harm to [the company's] competitive position in that it would allow competitors to estimate, and undercut, its bids." Id. at 530. For this same reason, we upheld in our prior decision PNR's withholding of a great deal of data that, for example, would have revealed Walters' actual costs, profit, and overhead.(3) However, we cannot find that such competitively sensitive information would be revealed by release of the pages at issue in the present case.

One of the three pages is a list of prices prepared by Walters for a number of products and services.(4)

The other two pages contain the prices for which three trucks were sold by an affiliate of Walters to another concrete company. Walters argues generally that the information withheld from the appellant would, if released, "give Burns detailed knowledge of Walters' various costs and strategies, which Burns could use to its competitive advantage in a number of ways." Letter from Sally B. Pfund and Robert J. Martinez, Williams & Jensen (representing Walters), to James S. Carey, Jr. (April 2, 1996) at 7. However, we cannot see how the release of any of the information in these pages would cause the types of competitive harm cited by Walters (e.g., allowing Burns to bargain with Walters' suppliers, divert future business from Walters, or gain enough knowledge of "Walters' financial information to be able to know where Burns might best be able to undercut Walters' prices"). Id.

We believe that two federal court cases cited by Burns, General Dynamics Corp., Space Sys. Div. v. Department of the Air Force, 822 F. Supp. 804 (D.D.C. 1992), and Acumenics Research & Technology v. Department of Justice, 843 F.2d 800 (4th Cir. 1988), support the release of the information in the pages at issue. Key to the courts' decisions in those cases to uphold the release of information was the fact that "competitively sensitive information such as cost, overhead, or profit identifiers would not be revealed." General Dynamics, 822 F. Supp. at 807; see Acumenics, 843 F.2d at 802, 806 (release of unit prices would not reveal Acumenics' "profit multiplier," the "product of a company's overhead, general and administrative costs (G & A), and profit, (overhead rate x G & A rate x profit)"). Other court cases dealing with the withholding of pricing information support the proposition that, "[t]o justify protection under exemption 4, a submitter must present persuasive evidence that disclosure of the unit prices would reveal some confidential piece of information, such as a profit multiplier or risk assessment, that would place the submitter at a competitive disadvantage." Comdisco, Inc., v. General Servs. Admin., 864 F. Supp. 510, 516 (E.D. Va. 1994); see also CC Distribs., Inc., v. Kinzinger, No. 94-1330, slip op. at 5 (D.D.C. 1995) ("Defendants [agency] repeatedly asked plaintiff to explain how its competitors could reverse-engineer its pricing methods and deduce its concessions from suppliers. In response, the record amply demonstrates that plaintiff merely restated its conclusions. On such a showing, defendants were unable to assess plaintiff's claims with any specificity, . . .")

In the present case, we find that Walters has not provided sufficient justification for withholding the information contained in the pages at issue. Again, we note that it has been over one year since Walters' most recent opportunity to present its position, and that Walters was asked to address the release of a large volume of information. We found the justification presented by Walters at that time sufficient to support the withholding of much of the information at issue in Burns' previous Appeal. Although Walters' arguments do not justify withholding the information contained in the three pages recently withheld from the appellant, we believe, as we stated in Section II.A above, that Walters should be given another opportunity to provide a basis for withholding this information. We will therefore also remand this portion of PNR's determination (withholding information from pages 203, 204 and 205). Absent an adequate basis for withholding, PNR should issue a new determination releasing the information in question to the appellant.

B. Adequacy of PNR's Search for Responsive Documents

Burns also asserts that there should be additional responsive documents in the possession of the DOE that have not been released. Appeal at 6. In the event we were to agree, we would order an additional search. However, we already reviewed PNR's search for responsive documents in our prior Appeal decision and found that the search was reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents and was therefore adequate. The OHA procedural regulations allow for our reconsideration of a prior Decision and Order under certain limited circumstances, none of which apply in the present case.(5) Therefore, to the extent that the present Appeal requests that we reconsider our previous decision as to the adequacy of PNR's search for responsive documents, the Appeal will be denied.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons explained above, we will remand this case to PNR, to promptly issue a new determination releasing the non-exempt information to the appellant in accordance with this decision, or explain in detail its reasons for withholding any of this information.(6) In all other respects, the present Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Burns Concrete, Inc., Case No. VFA-0284, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the DOE's Pittsburgh Naval Reactors Office, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

Office of Hearings and Appeals

(1) As we noted in our decision on Burns' previous Appeal, the Appellant disputes Walters' contention that Walters was not reimbursed by the government for the costs incurred in running tests on the concrete mix design. Although it appears from our review of the relevant documents that Walters was in fact reimbursed for the cost of testing, PNR assures us that Walters was reimbursed for the costs incurred in preparing the test results for submittal, but not for the costs of running the tests. Memorandum of telephone conversation between James Carey, PNR, and Steve Goering, OHA (October 24, 1996).

(2) In this Decision we will refer to pages by the page number assigned by the appellant in its Appeal.

(3) See 26 DOE ¶ 80,143 at 80,603, and cases cited therein (profit, general and administrative expenses, and overhead have been recognized by the courts as protected under Exemption 4).

(4) Burns speculates that the title of the price list, "Call in Prices," "indicate[s] that this list would be quoted by Walters over the telephone. This is also the information that anyone, including Burns Concrete or any other competitor, could easily obtain by simply calling Walters on the telephone. Therefore this list does not reflect information that the provider would not make available to the public." Appeal at 5. However, Walters informed PNR that the information on this list had not been made available to the public, and was for in-house use only. Memorandum of telephone conversation between James Carey, PNR, and Steven Goering, OHA (Apr. 11, 1997). In any event, as we explain in our discussion of the D.C. Circuit's decision in Critical Mass above, the mere fact that information is not customarily made available to the public exempts that information from disclosure under Exemption 4 only if that information was submitted to the government voluntarily, which is not the case here.

(5) The regulations state in pertinent part:

(b) (1) An application for modification or rescission of an order shall be processed only if--

(i) the application demonstrates that it is based on significantly changed circumstances; and

(ii) the period within which a person may file an appeal has lapsed or, if an appeal has been filed, a final order has been issued.

(2) For purposes of this subpart, the term "significantly changed circumstances" shall mean--

(i) the discovery of material facts that were not known or could not have been known at the time of the proceeding and action upon which the application is based;

(ii) the discovery of a law, rule, regulation, order or decision on appeal or exception that was in effect at the time of the proceeding upon which the application is based and which, if such had been made known to the OHA, would have been relevant to the proceeding and would have substantially altered the outcome; or

(iii) there has been a substantial change in the facts or circumstances upon which an outstanding and continuing order of the OHA affecting the applicant was issued, which change has occurred during the interval between issuance of such order and the date of the application and was caused by forces or circumstances beyond the control of the applicant.

10 C.F.R. § 1003.55(b).

(6) PNR has also agreed to release to the appellant information it inadvertently withheld from page 207, labeled "Remaining project to complete," and to attempt to provide the appellant a more legible copy of page 192, as requested in Burns' Appeal. Memorandum of telephone conversation between James Carey, PNR, and Steven Goering, OHA (Apr. 11, 1997); Appeal at 4, 5.

Case No. VFA-0286, 26 DOE ¶ 80,184

May 5, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Alfred G. Bell

Date of Filing: April 7, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0286

On April 7, 1997, Alfred G. Bell filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on March 24, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR). That determination was issued in response to a request for information submitted by Mr. Bell under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In his Appeal, Mr. Bell asserts that OR failed to provide him with a responsive document in its possession regarding a Request for Information he made on January 17, 1997.

I. Background

On January 17, 1997, Mr. Bell filed a request for information in which he sought a copy of an occurrence report completed as a result of his being diagnosed with Chronic Beryllium Disease in accordance with criteria outlined in DOE Order 5000.3B. See Determination Letter at 1. On March 24, 1997, OR issued a determination which stated it conducted a search of its files and located a report entitled "Individual Accident/Incident Report". Id. However, this was not the document Mr. Bell referred to in his request. Nevertheless, OR provided this report to Mr. Bell. OR further informed Mr. Bell that this report was the only record that it could locate concerning his diagnosis of Chronic Beryllium Disease. Id.

On April 7, 1997, Mr. Bell filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). In his Appeal, Mr. Bell challenges the adequacy of the search conducted by OR. Specifically, Mr. Bell argues that OR failed to provide him a copy of an occurrence report concerning him in accordance with DOE Order 5000.3B. Mr. Bell further contends that the existence of this report was alluded to by Mr. Rufus H. Smith, Diversity Programs and Employee Concerns Manager, OR, in a letter dated on January 14, 1997. He has enclosed a copy of this correspondence with his present Appeal. Mr. Bell asks that the OHA direct OR to conduct a new search for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was inadequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01, modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted officials at OR to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed. Upon receiving Mr. Bell's Request for Information, OR contacted the Y-12 Plant where Mr. Bell was employed at the time an occurrence report would have been generated concerning his diagnosis with Chronic Beryllium Disease. The Department of Energy Site Office as well as the contractor, Lockheed Martin Energy Systems, Inc., each conducted a search of its files and was unable to locate documents responsive to Mr. Bell's request. OR further indicated that the Y-12 Industrial Hygiene Department also conducted a manual search of its files and could not locate an occurrence report pertaining to Mr. Bell. However, during their search, OR was able to obtain medical records from the Y-12 Medical Department that pertained to Mr. Bell, specifically a report entitled "Individual Accident/Incident Report." This report was released to Mr. Bell. OR has confirmed to us that this report is not the occurrence report requested by Mr. Bell.

As stated earlier, the appellant argues that Mr. Rufus Smith, OR's Operations Diversity Programs and Employee Concerns Manager, indicated in a January 14 letter that a copy of an occurrence report was completed concerning Mr. Bell in accordance with the criteria outlined in DOE Order 5000.3B. Mr. Smith also indicated in this letter that Mr. Bell could gain access to this document through the Freedom of Information Act office in Oak Ridge. We have reviewed this correspondence and OR has informed us that it contacted Mr. Smith to search his files for the requested occurrence report. Subsequently, Mr. Smith informed officials in OR that he was unable to locate any reponsive documents, and signed a certification that a diligent and adequate search had been perfomed. See OR's Response at 1. Thus, it appears that Mr. Smith was mistaken when he stated in his January 14 letter that an occurrence report concerning Mr. Bell had been completed.(1) Given the facts presented to us, we find that OR conducted an adequate search which was reasonably calculated to discover documents responsive to Mr. Bell's Request. Therefore, we must deny this Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Alfred G. Bell, OHA Case No. VFA-0286, on April 7, 1997, is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0287, 26 DOE ¶ 80,186

May 9, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: John D. Kasprowicz

Date of Filing: April 15, 1997

On April 15, 1997, John D. Kasprowicz filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him by the Manager of the Department of Energy's (DOE) Chicago Operations Office (hereinafter referred to as "the Manager"). This determination was issued on April 7, 1997 in response to a request for information submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require that a document that was released to Mr. Kasprowicz in redacted form be released in its entirety.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In his FOIA request, Mr. Kasprowicz sought access to a copy of a November 22, 1996 memorandum from the Acting Chief Counsel of the Chicago Operations Office to the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. In this document, the Acting Chief Counsel discussed the issue of whether the Department of Justice (DOJ) should provide legal counsel for Mr. Kasprowicz and certain other DOE employees who were named as defendants in a civil lawsuit.

In her determination, the Manager found that portions of the memorandum were exempt from mandatory release under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5) and 552(b)(6) (Exemptions 5 and 6, respectively). Citing Exemption 5, the Manager withheld those portions of the memorandum that describe the Acting Chief Counsel's position as to whether the employees should receive DOJ representation. Exemption 5 shields from mandatory disclosure "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5).(1) The Manager further determined that the names of the DOE employees, other than Mr. Kasprowicz, who have requested DOJ representation should be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Exemption 6 protects from mandatory disclosure "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6).

In his Appeal, Mr. Kasprowicz does not contest the Manager's application of Exemption 6. Instead, he requests that we review the Manager's determination that portions of the memorandum may be withheld pursuant to Exemption 5.

II. Analysis

A. Applicability of Exemption 5

Exemption 5 is generally recognized as encompassing the attorney- client, attorney work-product and governmental deliberative process privileges. See, e.g., Coastal States Gas Corp. v. DOE, 617 F.2d 854 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). In withholding portions of the memorandum, the Manager relied upon the "deliberative process" and "attorney work product" privileges of Exemption 5. The "deliberative process" privilege shields from mandatory disclosure documents that are "predecisional" and "deliberative," i.e., that were created during agency consideration of a proposed action and that were part of a decision making process. Darci L. Rock, 13 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1985); Texaco, Inc., 1 DOE ¶ 80,242 (1978). The privilege serves to insure open, uninhibited and robust debate of various options by eliminating the fear of disclosure of preliminary viewpoints. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. Thus, by shielding predecisional deliberations from public scrutiny, the quality of final governmental decisions is enhanced. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149-51 (1975) (Sears). The "attorney work product "privilege serves to "provide working attorneys with a ?zone of privacy' within which to think, plan, weigh facts and evidence . . . , and prepare legal theories." Coastal States at 864. This privilege is applicable to documents that were prepared by an attorney "in contemplation of litigation." Id.

In order to properly evaluate the Manager's application of Exemption 5, we conducted a de novo review of the withheld material. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the Manager properly determined that the material redacted under Exemption 5 is exempt from mandatory disclosure. As we previously stated, Exemption 5 is applicable to documents that were created during consideration of a proposed action and which were part of a decision making process. The memorandum was created during the DOJ's consideration of the employees' requests for government representation, and consists in large part of a recitation of the Acting Counsel's opinions as to the substance of the employees' requests and the factors that should weigh into the DOJ's decision. The withheld portions are therefore predecisional and deliberative in nature. Furthermore, we conclude that the memorandum was prepared by an attorney "in contemplation of litigation," and may therefore be considered "attorney work product." The memorandum contains legal argument and recommendations as to whether the DOJ should become involved in pending litigation by agreeing to represent parties to that litigation. We therefore find that the withheld portions of the memorandum are exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5.

B. Segregability

The fact that a document contains material which is exempt from disclosure does not necessarily make the entire document exempt. The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). However, segregation and release of non-exempt material are not necessary when it is inextricably intertwined with the exempt material, such that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the confidentiality of the withheld material. Lead Industries Association v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

Based on our review of the memorandum, we find that the Manager has already provided Mr. Kasprowicz with all segregable factual information. Although the withheld portions of the memorandum contain some factual matter, we conclude that it is inextricably intertwined with exempt material, such that release of the factual material would expose the deliberative process of which the memorandum is a part. Accordingly, we find that the withheld portions of the memorandum contain no segregable factual material.

C. Public Interest Determination

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We find that release of the withheld material would not be in the public interest. Although the public does have a general interest in learning about the manner in which its government operates, we find that interest to be attenuated by the fact that the withheld portions of this memorandum are composed mainly of predecisional, non-factual recommendations and opinions, and would therefore be of limited educational value. Any slight benefit that would accrue from the release of the withheld material is far outweighed by the chilling effect that such a release would have on the willingness of DOE employees to make open and honest recommendations on policy matters. Accordingly, we conclude that release of the withheld information would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the deliberative process privilege. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (in order to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeably harm basic institutional interests that underlie the deliberative process privilege).

D. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the Manager properly redacted the memorandum provided to Mr. Kasprowicz pursuant to the FOIA, and that release of the withheld material would not be in the public interest. We will therefore deny his FOIA appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by John D. Kasprowicz on April 15, 1997 is hereby denied.

(1)*/ In his Appeal, Mr. Kasprowicz misinterprets the language of this exemption. He expresses a mistaken belief that this exemption is applicable only if the requester is involved in litigation against the agency from which records are sought. The language "which would not be available to a party ... in litigation with the agency" is a description of the types of documents that Exemption 5 was intended to protect, and does not mean that this exemption may only be applied in instances where the requester is party to a lawsuit involving the agency.

May 16, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Roderick L. Ott

Date of Filing:April 18, 1997

Case Number:VFA-0288

On April 18, 1997, Roderick L. Ott filed an Appeal from a March 24, 1997 determination by the Manager of the Office of Scientific and Technical Information (OSTI) of the Oak Ridge Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the Manager denied the Appellant's request for information and his request for a waiver of fees under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In his Appeal, Mr. Ott asks that we order a new search for responsive documents and grant his request for a fee waiver.

I. Background

In his request for information, Mr. Ott sought copies of all documents "pertaining to him" by name from the files of 28 named OSTI employees. On March 4, 1997, Mr. Ott clarified his request by asking for copies of all documents created since October 1, 1988 pertaining to him by name, and involving DOE activities he participated in, from the files of the 28 named OSTI employees. He further stated that this request included "Franklin planner records, notes, correspondence, and any other miscellaneous records." In the March 24, 1997 determination letter, the Manager denied Mr. Ott's request because it did not "reasonably describe the records sought" to enable an OSTI employee familiar with the subject matter to locate the records with a reasonable amount of effort. The Manager also stated that Franklin planner records and personal notes are personal records and are not subject to the FOIA. The Manager also denied Mr. Ott's request for a waiver of fees because Mr. Ott did not state how disclosure of the requested information would benefit the public interest. Finally, the Manager stated that to continue processing Mr. Ott's request, OSTI needed two things: (1) information that would allow it to properly identify the requested documents and (2) Mr. Ott's commitment to pay all fees associated with the processing of the request.

Mr. Ott appeals the "prolonging and denial" of his request and the decision to require him to pay search fees for the processing of his request. In his Appeal, Mr. Ott states that disclosure of the requested information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operations and activities of the government and that his request for information is not primarily in his commercial interest.

II. Analysis

The FOIA specifies two requirements for requests: that the request "reasonably describe" the records sought and that the requester make the request in accordance with an agency's published procedural regulations. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). A description of a requested record is sufficient if it enables a professional agency employee familiar with the subject area to locate the record with a "reasonable amount of effort." H.R. Rep. No. 876, 93rd Cong., 2d. Sess. 6 (1974), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6267, 6271. "Broad, sweeping requests lacking specificity are not permissible" under the FOIA. Marks v. Department of Justice, 578 F.2d 261, 263 (9th Cir. 1977).

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted OSTI to determine what would be involved to conduct a search for all documents since October 1, 1988 pertaining to Mr. Ott from the files of 28 named

OSTI employees, including "Franklin planner records, notes, correspondence, and any other miscellaneous records." A representative of OSTI estimated that it would cost at least $7,992 and consume more than 140 hours of search time to search the electronic mail records alone for documents "pertaining to" Mr. Ott. The OSTI representative stated that OSTI only has electronic mail records that go back one year, but that this search would require someone familiar with the system to look at each record individually. Furthermore, the OSTI representative also stated that there is no easy way of identifying information regarding Mr. Ott in its employees' files. Since Mr. Ott is an OSTI employee, documents "pertaining to him" and covering a wide array of subject matter could exist in multiple places in the 28 individuals' files. Thus, based on the way Mr. Ott worded his request, OSTI would have to search most of its office files for documents created since October 1, 1988 that might pertain to Mr. Ott. The OSTI representative also stated that he spoke with Mr. Ott approximately six times and requested that he narrow his request, but that Mr. Ott never did so.(1)

Under these circumstances, we find that Mr. Ott's request would require more than a "reasonable amount of effort" for OSTI to complete a search. Thus, we find that Mr. Ott's request is not reasonably descriptive as the FOIA requires. See Keese v. United States, 632 F. Supp. 85, 91 (S.D. Tex. 1985) (requests for all documents containing a requester's name are not "reasonably specific"). We also note that OSTI has indicated to us its willingness to confer with Mr. Ott to reformulate the scope of his request, should he desire to do so. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(c)(2)(DOE should offer assistance in reformulating a non-conforming request). Accordingly, we must deny Mr. Ott's request for a new search for responsive documents.

The FOIA generally requires that requesters pay fees for the processing of their requests. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(I); see also 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a). However, the Act states, Documents shall be furnished without any charge or at a charge reduced below the fees established under clause (ii) if disclosure of the information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government and is not primarily in the commercial interest of the requester.

5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii) (1988 ed.). The burden of satisfying this two-prong test is on the requester. Larson v. Central Intelligence Agency, 843 F.2d 1481, 1483 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (per curiam). The DOE has implemented the statutory standard for granting fee waivers in its FOIA regulations. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8). Those regulations set forth the following four factors that an agency must consider to determine whether the requester has met the first statutory fee waiver condition, i.e., whether disclosure of the requested information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of government operations or activities:

(A) the subject of the request; whether the subject of the requested records concerns "the operations or activities of the government";

(B) the informative value of the information to be disclosed; whether the disclosure is "likely to contribute" to an understanding of government operations or activities;

(C) the contribution to an understanding by the general public of the subject likely to result from disclosure; and

(D) the significance of the contribution to public understanding; whether the disclosure is likely to contribute "significantly" to public understanding of government operations or activities.

10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(I). Finally, in addition to satisfying these four factors, the DOE must also find that the requester did not request the information for use primarily in his own commercial interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(ii).

Factor A asks us to determine whether the subject of the requested documents concerns the operations or activities of the government. A fee waiver is appropriate only where the subject matter of the requested documents specifically concerns identifiable "operations or activities of the government." See Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481-83 (1989); U.A. Plumbers and Pipefitters Local 36, 24 DOE ¶ 80,148 at 80,621 (1994) (Local 36). The documents Mr. Ott requested concern a specific DOE employee. It is possible that documents pertaining specifically to Mr. Ott are documents that concern identifiable "operations or activities of the government." However, since Mr. Ott did not provide additional information regarding the subject matter or narrow the subject matter request, it is impossible for us to determine whether the requested information meets this requirement. Thus, we find that Mr. Ott has not adequately shown that his request meets the conditions outlined in Factor A.

Factor B requires a consideration of whether the disclosure of information is "likely to contribute" to the public's understanding of government operations and activities. See Local 36; Seehuus Associates, 23 DOE ¶ 80,180 (1994) (Seehuus). The focus of this factor is on whether the information is already in the public domain or otherwise common knowledge among the general population. Seehuus, 23 DOE at 80,694. If the information is already publicly available, release to the requester would not contribute to public understanding and a fee waiver may not be appropriate. The information at issue here is probably not in the public domain since it relates only to one individual. However, without additional information regarding the subject matter, we cannot determine whether releasing the information would contribute to the public's understanding of government operations. We therefore find that Mr. Ott has not adequately shown that his request meets the conditions outlined in Factor B.

Factor C requires us to consider whether the requested documents would contribute to the understanding of the subject by the general public. To meet this test, the requester must have the ability and intention to disseminate this information to the public. James L. Schwab, 22 DOE ¶ 80,133 at 80,569 (1992). In the present case, Mr. Ott has not shown that he has the ability to disseminate information to a significant number of people in the general public.

In order to satisfy the requirements of Factor D, the requested documents must contribute significantly to the public understanding of government operations or activities. The Department of Justice has suggested the following test for this factor:

To warrant a fee waiver or reduction of fees, the public's understanding of the subject matter in question, as compared to the level of public understanding existing prior to the disclosure, must be likely to be enhanced by the disclosure to a significant extent.

1995 Justice Department Guide to the Freedom of Information Act 381 (1995); See Local 36; Seehuus. In the present case, Mr. Ott has again not shown how the information he requested would enhance the public's understanding of government operations or activities, let alone show that the material would advance such understanding to a significant extent.

In view of our evaluation of the foregoing factors, we find that Mr. Ott has not satisfied any of the four factors that an agency must weigh to determine whether the requester has met the public interest requirement. Accordingly, we must deny Mr. Ott's Appeal for a fee waiver.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Roderick L. Ott on April 18, 1997 is hereby denied.

June 13, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Sandra Clayton

Date of Filing: May 16, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0289

On May 12, 1997, Sandra Clayton (Clayton) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her in response to a request for documents submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The determination was issued on March 13, 1997 by the Western Area Power Administration (WAPA). This Appeal, if granted, would require that WAPA release responsive documents, if they exist, that were withheld under FOIA Exemption 6, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6).

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On February 14, 1997, Clayton filed a request with WAPA for "a copy of all documents relating to the investigation and final report on the sexual harassment allegations from [a named individual] in reference to [a named individual]." Letter from Sandra Clayton to Manager, WAPA (February 14, 1997) (Request Letter). In the letter, Clayton also stated:

I am requesting the following:

- Copies of interviews from all parties (names withheld)
- Copies of all documents compiled relative and material to this investigation
- Copy of the final investigative report, whether it be draft, not formally issued, or formally issued ([name of investigator] investigation).

Request Letter. On March 13, 1997, WAPA responded to Clayton's request and would neither confirm nor deny the existence of records responsive to her request. It responded to the request for documents by stating:

[WAPA] neither confirms nor denies the existence of records responsive to your request. Lacking an individual's consent, or an overriding public interest, even to acknowledge the existence of such records pertaining to an individual could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal

Letter from FOIA Officer and General Counsel, WAPA, to Clayton (March 13, 1997) (Determination Letter). On April 15, 1997, Clayton replied to WAPA, appealing its decision. Letter from Clayton to FOIA Officer and General Counsel, WAPA (April 15, 1997). That letter was forwarded to the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) and this Appeal was filed on May 16, 1997.

II. Analysis

A. Clayton's Allegations

In her Appeal, Clayton alleges that WAPA's refusal to confirm or deny the existence of responsive records in order to protect the privacy of those participating in the investigation was improper. She argues that DOE should have redacted names from any responsive material, as directed in her request. In addition, she states that she is acquainted with many of the individuals involved in the investigation, and can secure their consent to release the information. She did not address the issue of the public interest in this matter. This Decision and Order will focus on the propriety of WAPA's determination of a privacy interest and its subsequent refusal to confirm or deny the existence of investigatory records concerning a third person. As detailed below, we will uphold both actions.

B. Exemption 6

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

An agency's statement in response to a FOIA request that it will neither confirm or deny the existence of records is commonly called a "Glomar" response.(1) We have previously used the Glomar response to protect individual privacy in connection with law enforcement proceedings under Exemption 7(C). Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,150 (1997); William Payne , 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996) (finding a strong privacy interest in protecting the identities of individuals who provide information to government investigators). However, WAPA does not allege that any law enforcement proceeding is, or was, at issue in this case. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Assistant General Counsel, WAPA, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye (June 3, 1997). Instead, WAPA relied on Exemption 6(2) for its use of the Glomar response. This procedure is equally applicable to protect an individual's privacy interest in sensitive non-law enforcement records such as welfare records, disciplinary records of relatively minor misconduct, or records of employee counseling programs. See Beck v. Department of Justice, 997 F.2d 1489, 1493 (D.C. Cir. 1993); Ray v. I.N.S., 778 F. Supp. 1212, 1214 (S.D. Fla. 1991).

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,174 (1997). First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

(1) Privacy Interest

Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals providing information to government investigators. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (KTVY- TV) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985) (Cucarro); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,109 (1990).

Clayton argues that she is acquainted with individuals who have participated in the alleged investigation, and can obtain their consent. However, she has not produced any documents supporting this assertion, nor has she proven to us that the individual who is the alleged target of the investigation has waived his or her privacy rights. Accordingly, we find that the individuals whose identities are allegedly being withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

(2) Public Interest in Disclosure

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. The Court held that only that information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Reporters Committee, 109 S. Ct. at 1483 (1989). The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

It is well settled that disclosure of the identity of individuals who have provided information to government investigators is not "affected with the public interest." See, e.g., Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1205; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469. In addition, federal courts have consistently denied requests for information identifying specific government employees as the subjects of findings of wrongdoings, explaining that such information sheds no light on the employer agency's actions. See Beck v. Department of Justice, 997 F.2d 1489, 1493 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (refusing to confirm or deny the existence of disciplinary records pertaining to named DEA agents); Department of Air Force v. Rose, 452 U.S. 352, 396 (1976) (denying third party request for names of disciplined Air Force Academy cadets); Ray v. I.N.S., 778 F. Supp. 1212, 1214 (S.D. Fla. 1991) (upholding INS' refusal to confirm or deny existence of investigative records concerning INS officer) (Ray). Clayton has not offered any evidence of an overriding public interest in this matter. We find that release of such information, if it exists, would not contribute significantly to the public's understanding of the operations of WAPA. Therefore, we find no overriding public interest in the alleged investigation.

(3) The Balancing Test

Because release of the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to subject them to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. In this case, merely acknowledging the existence of records would be tantamount to disclosing the fact that an individual has participated in or been the subject of an investigation, the disclosure of which fact would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. See Justice Department Guide to the FOIA, Department of Justice (September 1996) at 256. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non- existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing the individuals' identities, if such information exists, would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Our findings are consistent with those reached by several federal courts. When presented with a similar set of facts, these courts have found that the privacy interests of individuals supplying information to government investigators clearly outweigh the negligible public interest in disclosure of these individuals' identities. See, e.g., Safecard; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469 (finding withholding necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro, 770 F.2d at 359; Ray, 778 F. Supp. at 1214 (refusing to confirm or deny the existence of investigative records concerning agency employee in order to protect his reputation and good standing in the community).

For the reasons set forth above, we find that WAPA properly invoked the "Glomar" response and refused to confirm or deny the existence of the requested records under Exemption 6. Accordingly, this Appeal is denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Sandra Clayton on May 16, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0289) is hereby denied.

(1)"Glomar" refers to the first instance in which a federal court upheld the adequacy of such a response. Phillippi v. CIA, 546 F.2d 1009, 1013 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (agency responded to a request for documents pertaining to the submarine-retrieval ship "Glomar Explorer" by neither confirming nor denying the existence of any such documents). See also Minier v. CIA, 88 F.3d 796, 801-02 (9th Cir. 1996) ("neither confirm nor deny" response found proper for request seeking records on individual's employment relationship with CIA).

(2)Even though WAPA informed us that they relied on Exemption 6 of the FOIA, the determination letter did not mention the exemption by name and incorrectly used the less restrictive language of Exemption 7(C), i.e., "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Nevertheless, we are analyzing this case under the correct language of Exemption 6, i.e., "would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

May 23, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Bonita L. Haynes

Date of Filing: April 25, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0290

On April 25, 1997, Bonita Haynes (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on March 25, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (IG). In that determination, the IG released a redacted copy of a document requested by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld portions of that document.

I. BACKGROUND

The Appellant submitted a request for information to the IG seeking copies of a memorandum dated December 29, 1993 from IG case file No. I94RS033. Determination Letter at 1. On March 25, 1997, the IG issued a determination in response to this request releasing that document to the Appellant. However, the IG redacted the names of two individuals from the document. On April 25, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that the IG's withholding of the two names was improper.

II. ANALYSIS

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemptions 6 and 7(C) are at issue in the present case.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C.

Cir. 1974); Williams v. IRS, 479 F.2d 317, 318 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom. Donolon v. IRS, 414 U.S. 1024 (1973). By law, the IG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. The IG is therefore a classic example of an organization with a law enforcement mandate. In the present case the IG's investigatory actions were clearly within this statutory mandate.

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

We have previously considered cases in which both Exemption 6 and 7(C) were invoked, and we stated that in such cases, provided the Exemption 7 threshold of law enforcement purpose is met, we would analyze the withholding only under Exemption 7(C), the broader of the two exemptions. See, e.g., K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1992); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1991); James E. Phelps, 20 DOE ¶ 80,169 (1990). Since all of the documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes, any document that satisfies Exemption 7(C)'s "reasonableness" standard will be protected. Conversely, documents not protected by Exemption 7(C) will be unable to satisfy Exemption 6's more restrictive requirement that they constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

The IG has found a privacy interest in the identities of the two individuals whose names have been withheld. The Determination letter states in pertinent part:

Names and information that would tend to disclose the identity of certain individuals have been withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Individuals involved in Office of Inspector General investigative matters, which in these cases include subjects, witnesses, sources of information and other individuals, are entitled to privacy protections so that they will be free from harassment, intimidation and other personal intrusions.

Determination Letter at 1. Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of subjects, witnesses, and other sources of information. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (KTVY-TV) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985) (Cucarro). Accordingly, we have followed the courts' lead. James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,129 (1990).

One of the two individuals whose names are being withheld in the present case appears to be a potential subject of an IG investigation. Accordingly, the IG's identification and description of that individual's privacy interest is appropriate. However, the context of the document from which the names were redacted indicates that the second individual was neither a subject, a witness, nor a source of information. Rather this individual was a federal employee to whom the matter discussed in the memo was referred for further consideration. Therefore, the rationale supplied in the determination letter by the IG does not explain why it found that the federal employee had a protectable privacy interest. No other privacy interest in withholding this individual's identity is readily apparent. Consequently, we are remanding this portion of the Appeal to the IG. On remand the IG should either release this information or provide an adequate justification for its withholding.

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 109 S. Ct. at 1481-84. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 1483. Consequently, the Court held, only that information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

Because release of a subject's identity could reasonably be expected to subject him or her to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for the subject. It is well settled that the privacy interests of individuals that are the subjects of government investigations outweigh the public interest in the disclosure of their identities. See Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 381 (1976). After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing the subject's identity could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Accordingly, we find that the identity of the subject was properly withheld under Exemptions 6 and 7(C).

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about DOE actions, we are also mindful of the need to preserve the privacy rights of subjects. By releasing the responsive document with only those redactions necessary to prevent identification of specific individuals, the agency can provide as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights.

However, since the IG has not shown that release of the federal employee's name would intrude upon a protectable privacy interest, we are remanding that portion of the Appeal to the Office of Inspector General for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Bonita Haynes on April 25, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0290) is hereby granted and remanded to the Office of Inspector General for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above and is denied in all other aspects.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Martha J. McNeely

Date of Filing: April 28, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0291

On April 28, 1997, Martha J. McNeely filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her on March 27, 1997, by the Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division (FOIA/PAD) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned the remand of a prior Appeal Ms McNeely filed with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) regarding a request for information pursuant to the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. The initial request for information was made to the Richland Operations Office of the DOE. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be required to conduct a further search for Ms McNeely's medical records.

I. Background

On December 3, 1996, Ms McNeely submitted a Privacy Act request to Richland seeking copies of her medical and dental records along with any existing bone and tissue samples obtained from her. In her initial request, Ms McNeely stated that her parents had worked at the DOE's predecessors' facility at Hanford, Washington, and that she had received medical treatment at Kadlec Hospital and possibly other government facilities during the period 1946 through 1954. During this period, Kadlec Hospital was a federal government facility. Ms McNeely provided all the necessary information to conduct a search for the information she was requesting.

In its December 26, 1996 Determination Letter, Richland stated that it had conducted a search for her medical and dental records but was unable to locate any responsive records. On January 28, 1997, Ms McNeely filed an Appeal arguing that the search for information was inadequate. She indicated a number of studies that she may have been involved in as a child, including "Project Sunshine" and "Project Gabriel."

In a February 25, 1997 Decision and Order, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) found that Richland's search for responsive information was adequate, but because of Ms McNeely's assertions regarding her possible involvement with human radiation studies, we remanded the matter to DOE Headquarters for a search of other DOE facilities. We found that DOE Headquarters was best equipped to search for other human radiation documents. Martha J. McNeely, 26 DOE ¶ 80,164 (1997). In its March 27, 1997 Determination Letter, FOIA/PAD indicated that the files of the Office of Environment, Safety and Health contained no documents that were responsive to Ms McNeely's request. Determination Letter dated March 27, 1997, from GayLa D. Sessoms, Director, FOIA/PAD, to Martha J. McNeely. Approximately one month prior to the March 27 Determination Letter, Ms McNeely received a letter from Congresswoman Zoe Lofgren's office that enclosed a copy of a letter to the Congresswoman from Tara O'Toole, Assistant Secretary, Environment, Safety and Health. Dr. O'Toole's letter indicated that Ms McNeely's experiences do not indicate involvement in biomedical radiation experiments but rather radiation exposure of an environmental nature. Letter dated February 21, 1997, from Tara O'Toole, DOE Assistant Secretary, Environment, Safety and Health, to the Honorable Zoe Lofgren. Ms McNeely claims that Dr. O'Toole would have no way of knowing the nature of her medical treatment unless she had reviewed her medical records. Appeal Letter received April 28, 1997, from Martha J. McNeely to Office of Hearings and Appeals. Ms McNeely contends that the DOE, therefore, must have her medical records in its possession.

II. Analysis

The Privacy Act requires that each federal agency permit an individual to gain access to information pertaining to him or her which is contained in any system of records maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information is retrieved by the name or the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.2(m).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted FOIA/PAD to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed and to determine whether any documents responsive to Ms McNeely's request might exist. We were informed that the Radiation Office had been contacted to conduct a search for any records that might by responsive to Ms McNeely's request. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Janet R. H. Fishman, Attorney-Examiner, OHA, and Tonya Woods, FOIA/PAD, May 9, 1997. FOIA/PAD indicated that after an extensive computer search using Ms McNeely's name, social security number, and birth date, no records were found. In addition, the request was transferred to the Nevada Operations Office for a search of the Coordination and Information Center, which keeps records on radiation exposure to individuals. The Nevada Operations Office corresponded with Ms McNeely regarding its search during the course of this Appeal.

We are convinced that FOIA/PAD followed procedures which were reasonably calculated to uncover the material sought by Ms McNeely in her request. See Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). The fact that the search did not uncover documents Ms McNeely believed may be in the possession of DOE does not mean that the search was inadequate. In addition, Ms McNeely has not provided any evidence, beyond her personal belief, that any additional, relevant documents exist in the DOE's files. Therefore, under the circumstances of this case, we find that FOIA/PAD's search for responsive documents was adequate and that no further documents responsive to Ms McNeely's request exist at DOE.

Further, Ms McNeely asserts that Dr. O'Toole's letter to Congresswoman Lofgren is evidence of the existence of her medical records at DOE. She contends that Dr. O'Toole would have no basis for making some of the statements contained in the letter to the Congresswoman unless Dr. O'Toole had reviewed her medical records and is now refusing the disclose them. Appeal Letter. We have reviewed this contention and conclude that it is not correct. We contacted Pam Frank, the DOE Case Manager responsible for processing the request Dr. O'Toole's office received from Congresswoman Lofgren. Congresswoman Lofgren's request included a case information sheet that Ms McNeely had provided to Congresswoman Lofgren. Ms Frank indicated that after she reviewed Ms McNeely's case information sheet, she recommended to Dr. O'Toole that she make the determination that ultimately appeared in her February 21, 1997 letter. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Janet R. H. Fishman, Attorney-Examiner, OHA, and Pam Frank, DOE Case Manager, May 14, 1997. Contrary to Ms McNeely's assertions, Ms Frank's recommendation and Dr. O'Toole's determination were based exclusively on Ms McNeely's case information sheet. Therefore, Ms McNeely's assertion has no merit.

The FOIA/PAD conducted a search that was reasonably calculated to uncover the material Ms McNeely was requesting. Further, we do not believe Dr. O'Toole's office possessed any information that is being withheld from Ms McNeely. Rather, Dr. O'Toole's office reviewed the material Ms McNeely submitted and determined that DOE did not possess anything responsive to Ms McNeely's request. Accordingly, Ms McNeely's Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on April 28, 1997, by Martha J. McNeely, Case No. VFA-0291, is hereby denied.

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Mary Feild Jarvis

Date of Filing: May 2, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0292

On May 2, 1997, Mary Feild Jarvis, Ph.D., of Richland, Washington filed an Appeal from a determination issued on April 24, 1997 by the Richland Operations Office (Richland Operations) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied in part Dr. Jarvis' request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release some of the withheld information.

The FOIA requires that agency records that are held by a covered branch of the federal government, and that have not been made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). In addition to this requirement, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)- (b)(9). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure will nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

On November 26, 1995, Dr. Jarvis, a DOE employee in Richland, Washington, filed a FOIA request with the DOE Office of the Inspector General seeking documents pertaining to one of its investigations. On February 25, 1997, the Office of the Inspector General referred fourteen responsive documents to Richland Operations, as the originating office, for a release determination. Richland Operations issued its determination on April 24, 1997. It released thirteen of the fourteen documents in full. However, it withheld portions of Document 2, a multi-part item that addresses a possible breach of the standards of ethical conduct by a DOE employee. To the extent it is relevant to this Appeal, Richland Operations withheld portions of an attachment to a letter to the DOE Regional Inspector General from the Richland Operations Office Chief Counsel that is part of Document Two. This two page attachment details the procedural history of the particular ethics concern. It also has a brief sketch of the substance of the concern. From this enclosure, Richland Operations Office deleted the name and routing symbol of the person who reported the concern as well as virtually the entire substance of the concern. The determination letter states that it withheld "names and other personal identifiers" under Exemption 6 of the FOIA, which protects personal privacy. The information withheld, however, goes well beyond the usual meaning of "personal identifiers," which are usually addresses, phone numbers, employee and social security numbers and the like, a definitional matter which has caused some difficulty in processing this Appeal. Dr. Jarvis only appeals the withholdings from this letter attachment in

Exemption 6 permits an agency to make a discretionary withholding of information that must otherwise be released in response to a FOIA request if the materials are "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). After ensuring that the documents meet the threshold test for types of material covered by Exemption 6, an agency must balance the public interest in disclosure with the privacy interest involved. Department of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 164, 175 (1991); Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762 (1989) (Reporters Committee); Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 372 (1976) (Rose); Harold H. Johnson, 21 DOE ¶ 80,148 at 80,640 (1991).

First, we believe that Document 2 meets the Exemption 6 threshold test as of being within the category of "personnel and medical files and similar files." The Supreme Court has taken a spacious view of what falls within this phrase. The Court has made clear that Exemption 6 extends to "detailed Government records on an individual which can be identified as applying to that individual." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 602 (1982) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 89-1497, at 11 (1966), reprinted in 1966 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2418, 2428). See also Annotation, When Are Government Records "Similar Files" Exempt From Disclosure Under Freedom of Information Act Provision (5 USCS § 552(b)(6)) Exempting Certain Personnel, Medical and "Similar Files", 106 A.L.R. Fed. 94, 102 (1992). In this case, the document under consideration deals with an alleged ethical lapse by a particular DOE employee. This easily falls within the Supreme Court's Exemption 6 threshold definition. See Rose, 425 U.S. at 376-80; cf. Schonberger v. National Transp. Safety Bd., 508 F. Supp. 941, 943 (D.D.C. 1981) (material on employee discipline qualifies for Exemption 6 treatment).

In applying the balancing part of the Exemption 6 test, we must examine each type of information withheld, identify any privacy interest involved and weigh that against any public interest in the material as defined by the Supreme Court. In this case, because of the variety of material involved, we must consider Document 2 almost on a paragraph-by-paragraph basis.

First, Richland Operations withheld the name and an identifying address for the person who brought forward the ethics concern. We have not previously dealt with this particular type of name withholding. Nor have we unearthed any court decision dealing with the issue. However, we have consistently withheld the names of people who were sources in Inspector General investigations. Like an ethics concern, those documents involve inquiries into possible violations of legally binding standards of conduct. In those cases, we have found that the sources have a considerable privacy interest in having their identity shielded from disclosure for fear of the possibility of unwanted contacts or harassment. See, e.g., J.B. (Jack) Truher, 26 DOE ¶ 80,154 at 80,675 (1997) (and cases cited therein); Keci Corp., 26 DOE ¶ 80,150 at 80,661 (1997) (and cases cited therein). We find that rationale persuasive in this case as well.

Second, Richland Operations withheld almost the entire content of the substance of the concern. Virtually all of the withheld material consists of neutral recitations of official government activity by government employees, the names of government employees, and the name of one contractor employee. We have examined the unredacted document in detail and are unable to discern any privacy interest in most of the material withheld.

We have consistently found that names, by themselves, reveal nothing private about a person and, therefore, are not the type of information that creates a protectable privacy interest for the purposes of Exemption 6. The News Tribune, 25 DOE ¶ 80,181 at 80,700 (1996). A privacy interest may be created only when an individual's name is linked with some other piece of information "which reveals something personal about an individual." Id. at 80,699. In an Exemption 6 analysis, we must examine any linkage of information involved to determine the extent of any privacy interest. In this case, with the exception of the name of the source, the only links concern place of employment and knowledge of events. So far as government employees are concerned, we find there is no privacy interest involved in this type of linkage. As far as a link of a name with the place of employment, we have said in the past, "[a]bsent unusual circumstances usually directly related to the nature of the job . . . individuals do not have a privacy interest in the fact that the federal government employs them." The Cincinnati Enquirer, 25 DOE ¶ 80,206 at 70,769 (1996). Nor do we find any privacy interest in the knowledge of the facts surrounding the alleged ethics concern. The knowledge of these facts arises entirely from official government business. While there may be some limited circumstances when an agency might, in the course of official duties, acquire knowledge (such as criminal activity which might put that person in some form of jeopardy) for which privacy protection under Exemption 6 might be appropriate, such is not the case here. As a general matter, there simply is no privacy interest in material stating or describing a federal employee's official actions or duties "unless the work somehow reveals something personal or private about the individual . . . or there is some other special circumstance (for example, a reasonable, articulable belief that the person could be subject to harassment. . .)." Id. (citations omitted). See also William H. Payne, 25 DOE ¶ 80,190 at 80,727 (1996). There appears to be little, if any, information of this latter type in the withheld material, and what information that arguably might fall in that category can be sufficiently shielded by a more selective redaction.

Similarly, we find no privacy interest in the name and affiliation of a contractor employee who has direct knowledge of the facts of the potential ethics irregularity. We have recently found no privacy interest involved in the names and service dates of employees of Westinghouse Hanford Company, a DOE contractor. Diane C. Larson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 at 80,539-40 (1996). If this more detailed information does not present a privacy concern, it is unlikely in most cases that merely being named as a DOE contractor employee raises a privacy issue. Thus, absent some special consideration not present in this case, the simple information that a particular person works for a specified DOE contractor does not present a privacy interest. In addition, as we found above, in this case we see no privacy interest in knowledge of these official government activities surrounding the potential ethics concern.

Richland Operations states that it withheld the content of the ethics concern and the events surrounding it because it believes that a person knowledgeable about the case could determine who reported the ethics concern unless all the material is withheld. Our review of the document does not lead us inexorably to that conclusion. The enclosure enumerates six DOE employees and one contractor employee who have direct knowledge of the facts of the possible ethics concern. While a privacy concern may arise if there is a small group of people and one could tell from the withheld information which member of the group raised an allegation of misconduct, Anibal L. Taboas, 25 DOE ¶ 80,207 at 80,773 (1996), we do not believe that is the situation here. The withheld information is so general and presented in such a neutral manner, that it seems unlikely that anyone could positively identify the source. In fact, the information in the attachment is so sketchy that someone who does not have direct knowledge of the facts, but who was told quickly about them, easily would have sufficient information to raise the ethics concern. Even if we could limit consideration to actual participants in the underlying activity, the enclosure clearly states that its enumeration of persons is not an exclusive list. Thus the group of people who have direct knowledge of and could have reported the alleged ethics concern necessarily extends beyond the withheld roster in Document 2. Therefore, once the name of the person who reported the concern is excised in those spots where the person is identified as the source of the concern (along with associated phrases), one cannot tell whether or not that name even appears in the enumeration. When one reasonably cannot identify who the reporting person is, then we believe there is no privacy interest involved in the material. Id.; see also Rose, 425 U.S. at 380 (summaries of Air Force Academy disciplinary proceedings should be released after redaction of identifying references); Carlos Blanco, 26 DOE ¶ 80,148 at 80,654 (1996) (substantive information should be released if privacy interest can be protected by redaction).

In considering the other part of the Exemption 6 equation for the only item for which we have definitively identified a privacy interest, the name and words associated with the source of the ethics concern, we are compelled to employ the Supreme Court's very narrow definition of what constitutes a public interest. For the purposes of Exemption 6 under the Supreme Court standard, information advances the public interest only if the information is likely to contribute "'significantly to public understanding of the operations of the government.'" Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 775 (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii)). See also Department of Defense v. Federal Labor Relations Auth., 510 U.S. 487, 494-95 (1994). In this case, we cannot discern in the name (and associated material) any public interest that conforms to the Supreme Court standard. As we have noted in other, similar situations where individuals come forth with information about possible infractions, the release of the name tells nothing about the workings of government; conversely, there is a considerable interest in insuring that people feel free to bring possible wrongdoing to the attention of the proper authorities and that this interest is promoted by protecting identities of those who give the government such information. See Michael A. Grosche, 26 DOE ¶ 80,146 at 80,644 (1996).

The only potential public interest identified by the appellant is her claim that she needs the information to pursue potential litigation enforcing the equal employment laws. She has provided no further details of the alleged wrong-doing. However, as both this Office and the courts have made clear, unsubstantiated allegations of misconduct do not rise to the level of a public interest for the purposes of Exemption 6. See William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,703 (1997) (and cases cited therein). Thus, in this case, we find that both the public and privacy interests we identified support withholding the name of the person who brought forward the ethics concern and associated phrases.

Accordingly, we will remand this case to Richland Operations. That Office shall issue a new determination either promptly releasing the non-source information or further explaining its withholding by identifying and explaining any privacy interest(s) for some or all of the withheld material and determine whether the identified interest(s) outweigh the public interest in disclosure. See, e.g., Raytheon Co., 25 DOE ¶ 80,156 at 80,640 (1996).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal of Mary Feild Jarvis, OHA Case No. VFA-0292, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Richland Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

June 6, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Information Focus on Energy, Inc.

Date of Filing: May 6, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0293

On May 6, 1997, Information Focus on Energy, Inc., (IFOE) filed an Appeal from a determination issued on March 31, 1997, by the Ohio Field Office (OFO) of the Department of Energy (DOE). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Parts 1004 and 1008.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On January 6, 1997, OFO received IFOE's request for, inter alia, "[c]opies of all DOE inspector reports for 1996 for the [DOE's] Fernald and Mound Sites. Also, copies of notes and/or written observations by DOE Facility Representatives and Environment, Safety and Health Site Representatives, or their managers, for 1996 at the Fernald and Mound Sites." Letter from Robert M. Keller, President, IFOE, to Freedom of Information Officer, Headquarters, DOE (October 15, 1996).(1)

OFO issued a determination on March 31, 1997, in which it released documents responsive to the appellant's request, but redacted from those documents portions which it described as "personal identifying information of individuals, including names of employees who may have been involved in various work-related incidents and other purely personal information regarding individuals . . . ." Letter from J. Phil Harmic, Manager, OFO, to Robert Keller, IFOE (March 31, 1997). OFO cited Exemption 6 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6), as the basis for withholding this information.

In its Appeal, IFOE states,

In the March 31 reply, [OFO] supplied copies of material by Facility Representatives for January, 1996, and presumably, by their immediate supervisors. Not supplied was any material indicating how those notes and/or observations were used by [OFO] managers in directing their contractors. Additional material relating to uses of Facility Representative notes and written observations by [OFO] managers is sought under this Appeal.

Appeal at 1. IFOE also contends that the information redacted from the documents it obtained is not exempt from disclosure under the FOIA. Id. at 1-2.

II. Analysis

A. Additional Material Sought by IFOE

Regarding IFOE's request for additional materials in its Appeal, we have generally held that an appellant may not expand the scope of a request on appeal. Energy Research Found., 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529-30 (1992); F.A.C.T.S., 26 DOE ¶ 80,132 at 80,578 (1996). In its original request, IFOE only asked for certain "notes and/or written observations." It did not request "material indicating how those notes and/or observations were used" until it filed the present Appeal. Because this additional request clearly represents an expansion of the scope of IFOE's request, this portion of IFOE's Appeal will be denied.(2)

B. The Applicability of FOIA Exemption 6 to the Information Withheld by OFO

There are three documents from which OFO withheld information under Exemption 6. One is entitled "TEAM MEMBER INFORMATION," and lists the names, titles, workplace addresses, work telephone numbers, and home telephone numbers of seven individuals who work for the DOE, a DOE contractor, or other private companies. OFO withheld only the home telephone numbers from this document. Another document, which is four pages long and handwritten, concerns the discovery of radioactively contaminated uniforms of guards at a DOE facility. The document details the actions taken once the contamination was discovered. Only the names of the affected guards were withheld from this document. The third document contains the results of a review of health and safety procedures and policies implemented by OFO. From one page of this document OFO withheld the names of three DOE employees, as well as substantive comments regarding two of the employees.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

1. Whether the Records at Issue are Personnel, Medical, or Similar Files

IFOE argues in its Appeal that because Exemption 6 "applies to personnel records, medical records and similar documents," it does not apply to "[d]ocuments which refer to or document performance of duties by Federal employees . . . ." Appeal at 2. However, in Washington Post, the Supreme Court made clear that "information about an individual should not lose the protection of Exemption 6 merely because it is stored by an agency in records other than ?personnel' or ?medical' files." Washington Post, 456 U.S. at 601. The Court concluded that the scope of Exemption 6 extends to any information contained in government records "which applies to a particular individual . . . ." Id. at 602; see also New York Times Co. v. NASA, 920 F.2d 1002 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (en banc) (applying Exemption 6 to tape recording of the last words of the crew of the space shuttle Challenger). In the present case, it is clear that each of the documents at issue contains information that applies to particular individuals. We therefore reject IFOE's assertion that these documents do not fall within the general scope of Exemption 6.

2. Whether the Information at Issue was Properly Withheld Under Exemption 6

The appellant also contends the OFO improperly withheld information under Exemption 6. In order to determine whether information may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of HUD, 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749 (1989); Hopkins v. Department of HUD, 929 F.2d 81, 88 (2d Cir. 1991); FLRA v. Department of Treasury Fin. Management Serv., 884 F.2d 1446, 1451 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 864 (1990). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 762-70.

a. The Privacy Interests

Regarding the home telephone numbers of individuals withheld from IFOE, we find that significant privacy interests of these individuals would be affected by the release of this information. In finding that federal employees have a privacy interest in their home addresses, the Supreme Court has reasoned that "[m]any people simply do not want to be disturbed at home by work-related matters. . . . We are reluctant to disparage the privacy of the home, which is accorded special consideration in our Constitution, laws, and traditions." Department of Defense v. Federal Labor Relations Auth., 510 U.S. 487, 501 (1994) (citations omitted). The Court recognized that "home addresses often are publicly available through sources such as telephone directories and voter registration lists, but ?[i]n an organized society, there are few facts that are not at one time or another divulged to another.'" Id. at 500 (quoting Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 763). The same reasoning leads us to conclude here that the individuals whose home telephone numbers were withheld by OFO have an significant interest in preventing the further dissemination of this information.

We next consider the privacy interests of the guards whose names appear in a document regarding the exposure of their uniforms to radiation. In an analogous prior case, we found that the subjects of human radiation experiments had a significant interest in protecting their names from disclosure. Morrison & Foerster, 24 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1994). We noted that the "language of the FOIA clearly indicates that preventing the public disclosure of an individual's medical condition is among the core purposes of Exemption 6." Id. at 80,517 (citing Rural Hous. Alliance v. Department of Agric., 498 F.2d 73, 77 (D.C. Cir. 1974)). In the present case, the document in question does not reveal the specific impact of any radiation exposure on the medical condition of the guards. However, given the potential medical effects of radiation exposure, we conclude that the guards have a substantial privacy interest in the fact that they were or may have been exposed to radiation.

The DOE employees who are referred to in the third document in question also have a privacy interest that would be affected by the disclosure of their identities. The document contains comments addressing their job performance, and the courts have found that employees have substantial privacy interests with respect to such information, even if the information is favorable to an employee. See, e.g., Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

b. The Public Interest

Having found that significant privacy interests are at stake in all of the information withheld by OFO, we next must determine if these interests are outweighed by the public interest in disclosure of the information. In making this determination, as we note above, we look to whether release of the information would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government.

First, we find that no public interest would be served by release of the home telephone numbers withheld by OFO, as this information reveals nothing about the operations and activities of the Government. Similarly, we do not see how the disclosure of the names of the guards whose uniforms were contaminated by radiation would provide any information to the public regarding the workings of its Government. Although the fact that the uniforms were contaminated and the actions taken in response are matters of public interest, that information has already been released, and we find that no additional public interest would be served by the release of the names of the guards to whom the uniforms belonged. Thus, with respect to these two documents, we find that there is not a public interest in release of the information sufficient to outweigh the privacy interest at stake.

Finally, we turn to the issue of whether disclosing the identities of the DOE employees in the third document at issue would shed light on the operations and activities of the Government. IFOE argues in its Appeal that withholding the names of these individuals "prevents the public from holding its Federal and contractor employees accountable for actions which may protect or harm the health of employees and members of the public (including themselves)." Appeal at 2.

We agree with the appellant that there is a strong public interest in the operations and activities of the DOE as they affect the health and safety of the public and of DOE and contractor employees, and the document at issue does contain an appraisal of OFO's practices and policies in this area. However, the narrow question we face here is whether identifying individual DOE employees would shed light on those activities. The courts have generally found that where there is proven wrongdoing of a serious and intentional nature by high-level agency employees, the public interest in holding individual employees accountable for their actions outweighs any interest of such employees in shielding their identity. See, e.g., Stern v. Federal Bureau of Investigation, 737 F.2d 84, 94 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (public interest in "malfeasance by [a] senior FBI official . . . is not outweighed by his own interest in personal privacy"). On the other hand, in weighing privacy interests against the public interest in learning about misconduct by lower-level employees, the courts have found that the balance tips in favor of the privacy interest of the employee. Id. at 92 (privacy interest of lower-level employees "culpable only for inadvertence and negligence" outweighs the public interest in their identities). In the present case, two of the three individuals whose identities have been withheld are managers who have some level of responsiblity for implementing OH health and safety policy (the third individual is a general engineer at OH). However, regardless of the level of responsiblity exercised by these individuals, the document does not reveal serious and intentional wrongdoing on their part or even contain allegations of such misconduct. Indeed, it appears from our review of the document that it contains only the opinions of an observer on the health and safety activities of OFO. We therefore conclude that the public interest in the identities of these employees does not outweigh the privacy interests of the employees discussed above.

However, based on our review of the third document, we find that OFO withheld more information than was necessary to conceal the identities of the employees named in that document. Specifically, OFO withheld substantive comments of the author of the document that, by themselves, would not identify the employees in question. Such information appears after the first and second bullet on that page and at the beginning of the last line of material redacted in the document. We will therefore remand this matter to OFO to segregate the information in this document that does not reveal the identities of the three DOE employees, and to release that information or provide a basis other than FOIA Exemption 6 for its withholding.(3) In all other respects, the present Appeal will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Information Focus on Energy, Inc., on May 6, 1997, Case Number VFA-0293, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Ohio Field Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1) IFOE also requested documents concerning the DOE's Savannah River Site. Copies of the request, which was filed with DOE Headquarters, were forwarded to OFO and the DOE's Savannah River Operations Office.

(2) Concurrent with the filing of IFOE's Appeal, OFO received a request from IFOE for these additional materials. Letter from Lewis Holman, IFOE, to Freedom of Information Officer, OFO (May 3, 1997) (received by OFO on May 6, 1997).

(3) It is possible that this information may be subject to withholding under the deliberative process privilege of FOIA Exemption 5. However, even if the information may be withheld under that Exemption, the information should be released unless OFO "reasonably foresees that disclosure would be harmful to an interest protected" by the Exemption. Case No. VFA-0294, 26 DOE ¶ 80,197

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Patricia L. Baade

Date of Filing:June 3, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0294

On June 3, 1997, Patricia L. Baade (Appellant) completed the filing of an Appeal from determinations issued on April 3, 1997 and April 23, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Freedom of Information Act/Privacy Act Division and the Office of Inspector General, respectively.(1)These determinations were issued in response to a request for information submitted by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. In this Decision and Order, we will determine whether the DOE must release or identify materials withheld under FOIA Exemption 7(C), 5 U.S.C. §552(b)(7)(C), and conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA request.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

On February 2, 1997, the Appellant submitted a FOIA and Privacy Act request to the FOIA/Privacy Act Division seeking copies of any records pertaining to her that are in the possession of various DOE offices, including the Office of Economic Impact and Diversity (ED) and the Office of Inspector General (OIG).(2) The FOIA/Privacy Act Division requested that ED and OIG respond separately to the Appellant. The FOIA/Privacy Act Division then coordinated a search by the Offices of Personnel, Energy Intelligence, General Counsel and Safeguards and Security. On February 11, 1997, the FOIA/Privacy Act Division sent a letter to the Appellant requesting that she supply identifying information and fill out DOE Form 1800.1 for Privacy Act requests. This is a standard practice of the FOIA/Privacy Act Division which is followed in order to protect the privacy rights of individuals. The Appellant did not respond to that letter. On April 3, 1997, the FOIA/Privacy Act Division issued its determination, stating that the Offices of Personnel, Energy Intelligence, General Counsel and Safeguards and Security could not locate any responsive documents. On April 23, 1997, the OIG issued a separate determination, stating that because the Appellant had not supplied the information requested by the FOIA/Privacy Act Division, OIG treated the Appellant's request as a third-party request. Therefore, it stated,

[t]he Office of Inspector General neither confirms nor denies the existence of records responsive to your request. Lacking an individual's consent, an official acknowledgment of an investigation, or an overriding public interest, even to acknowledge the existence of such records pertaining to an individual could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Refer to 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C).

On June 3, 1997, the Appellant completed the filing of the present Appeal in which she contends that DOE's search for documents was inadequate and that OIG should release to her any responsive documents that it possesses.(3)

ANALYSIS

This Decision and Order will focus on the adequacy of DOE's search for records responsive to the Appellant's request and the propriety of OIG's refusal to confirm or deny the existence of responsive records. As detailed below, we have decided to remand this matter to the Headquarters' FOIA Office to conduct an additional search for responsive records, and we uphold OIG's refusal to confirm or deny the existence of records responsive to the Appellant's request.

I. Adequacy of the Search

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

We first contacted the FOIA/Privacy Act Division to determine how the search had been coordinated. We learned that despite the fact that the Appellant had named five particular offices - the DOE Employee Counseling Services, Office of the Executive Secretariat, "health clinic," Office of the Assistant Secretary for Policy and International Affairs and the FOIA/Privacy Act Division itself as offices she believes possess responsive documents, none of these offices was searched. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Tonya Woods and Dawn Goldstein (May 20, 1997). Further, we have now learned that the Appellant was an employee of the Energy Information Administration (EIA), and that departmental element has not been searched for responsive records. In addition, on the basis of the Appellant's letter to this Office received on June 3, 1997, we now believe that the Chief Financial Officer may possess responsive documents concerning an Equal Employment Opportunity case settlement the Appellant received in approximately 1985. Further, as explained below, it is possible that the Office of Labor/Management and Employee Services may possess responsive documents. We therefore must remand this case to the FOIA/Privacy Act Division in order that these eight offices be searched for responsive documents.(4)

We then contacted the four offices that were searched to determine the extent of the searches performed. We learned that the Office of Safeguards and Security (OSS) had not been aware of the fact that the Appellant was a DOE employee from at least October 1, 1977 until July 15, 1985. OSS informed us that while microfiche records show that OSS had at least formerly possessed records pertaining to the Appellant, it was uncertain whether it had retained these records. It therefore agreed to conduct a new search for respective documents. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Victor Hawkins, OSS, and Dawn Goldstein (May 21, 1997).

The Office of Energy Intelligence (OEI) informed us that it possesses an extensive index of the names of all persons in its files. This index includes records dating from the time the DOE employed the Appellant. OEI informed us that none of the three names the Appellant used in the past or present is listed in its files. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Ed McGinnis, OEI, and Dawn Goldstein (May 22, 1997).

We believe that OEI has conducted a reasonable search.

Marilyn Greene of the Office of Personnel informed us that it had not realized that the Appellant had ended her tenure at DOE some twelve years ago. The Appellant's personnel records, including any health insurance records, which were formerly possessed by DOE, are currently the property of the National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Marilyn Greene and Dawn Goldstein (May 22, 1997); Record of Telephone Conversation between Verlette Moore, FOIA/Privacy Act Division, and Dawn Goldstein (June 11, 1997). The Appellant may make a request of the National Personnel Records Center by writing to: 111 Winnebago Street, St. Louis, MO 63118-4199.

Two individuals at the Office of Assistant General Counsel for General Law (OGC), Isiah Smith and Maryann Shebek, were assigned to conduct a search of OGC. After learning from this Office of the age of any possible responsive documents, Isiah Smith informed us that he planned to conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's request. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Isiah Smith, OGC, and Dawn Goldstein (June 2, 1997). Maryann Shebek informed us that after conducting a new search, records responsive to the Appellant's request had been found. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Maryann Shebek, OGC, and Dawn Goldstein (June 2, 1997). According to Abel Lopez of OGC, his office planned to release those documents to the Appellant in a new determination which would also include the results of Mr. Smith's further search. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Abel Lopez and Dawn Goldstein (June 4, 1997). Ms. Shebek further informed us that Alison Davidow of Labor/Management and Employee Services may also possess responsive records. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Maryann Shebek and Dawn Goldstein (June 2, 1997).

Consequently, we shall direct this matter to the FOIA/Privacy Act Division for further action. Upon receiving the relevant files, the FOIA/Privacy Act Division shall coordinate a new search involving the offices mentioned above for a further or new search. It shall identify all documents responsive to the Appellant's request and either release them or provide adequate justification for withholding any portion of them.(5)

II. OIG's Refusal to Confirm or Deny the Existence of Records(6)

An agency's statement in response to a FOIA request that it will neither confirm nor deny the existence of records is commonly called a "Glomar" response.(7) A Glomar response is justified when the records sought, if they exist, would be exempt from disclosure under the FOIA, and the confirmation of the existence of such records would itself reveal exempt information. See Antonelli v. F.B.I., 721 F.2d 615 (7th Cir. 1983). As detailed below, these circumstances exist here, and OIG correctly refused to admit or deny the existence of records involving the Appellant.

OIG has a consistent policy of refusing to confirm or deny the existence of records in response to a FOIA request when the circumstances described in Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,150 (1997) and William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996) exist. Thus, first-party requesters (people who request information about themselves) must submit DOE Form 1800.1 and identifying information in order to ensure that individual privacy is protected to the highest degree possible. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Jackie Becker, OIG, and Dawn Goldstein (May 19, 1997). Because the Appellant never provided such information, OIG had no choice but to treat her as a third-party requester.(8) While we would prefer not to do so, in this Decision we therefore must consider the Appeal as though the FOIA request were filed by a third party, not by the subject of the information requesting her own records.

A consistent Glomar response to such FOIA requests is necessary to protect the privacy rights of individuals who have been the subjects of OIG investigations. If OIG had stated that documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA request exist, but claimed that the documents themselves were exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(C), it would have revealed the existence of a law enforcement investigation involving the subject of the requested information.(9) If OIG uses Glomar responses only when responsive records do exist and denies the existence of responsive documents when they do not exist, then FOIA requesters could infer that OIG refuses to confirm or deny the existence of enforcement records only when such records actually exist. This could compromise the privacy rights of individuals who may be the subjects of third-party FOIA requests in the future.

We find that OIG was justified in providing a Glomar response to the Appellant's FOIA request because the records sought, if they exist, would be exempt from disclosure to third parties under the FOIA and the confirmation of the existence of such records would itself reveal exempt information. Accordingly, we will deny the portion of the Appeal that relates to OIG's refusal to confirm or deny the existence of enforcement records concerning the subject of the information.

III. Waiver

The Appellant claims that OIG has placed information from her alleged enforcement file into the public domain by disseminating the contents of her alleged OIG file and other information about her to various state and local agencies, as well as to the National Crime Information Center (NCIC) Interstate Identification Index. The Appellant therefore implies that DOE has waived the application of Exemption 7(C) to her alleged file because it has previously disclosed the contents therein.

However, the Appellant has failed to show that IG has taken any such action. The NCIC record that the Appellant sent to us does not include any mention of the topic of her alleged OIG enforcement file, nor does it demonstrate the source of the information contained in it. In addition, the OIG denies categorically that the OIG ever submits reports of any kind to the NCIC. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Jackie Becker, OIG, and Dawn Goldstein (May 19, 1997).

The extent to which the DOE has waived FOIA exemptions depends on the circumstances of the disclosure. Carson v. Department of Justice, 631 F.2d 1008, 1016 n.30 (D.C. Cir. 1980). As found above, the Appellant has not demonstrated that any contents of an alleged OIG file relating to her have been disclosed either by official or unofficial departmental action.(10) Moreover, even if the DOE had released information into the NCIC, this database would not be considered the public domain since the database can only be used only by law enforcement agencies. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Jackie Becker and Dawn Goldstein (May 19, 1997). We therefore reject the Appellant's argument that the DOE has waived Exemption 7(C).

CONCLUSION

We will grant the present Appeal to the extent that we will require that DOE conduct a further search for documents. We will remand this matter to the Headquarters' FOIA/Privacy Act Division for a new determination with instructions to conduct a search for additional documents in other DOE offices. We will deny the portion of the Appeal that relates to OIG's refusal to confirm or deny the existence of enforcement records concerning the subject of the information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Patricia L. Baade on June 3, 1997, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is remanded to the FOIA/Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat which shall coordinate a search of the following departmental elements for documents responsive to the Appellant's February 3, 1997 FOIA request: DOE Employee Counseling Services, Office of the Executive Secretariat, the Forrestal and Germantown health clinics, Office of the Assistant Secretary for Policy and International Affairs, FOIA/Privacy Act Division, Energy Information Administration, Chief Financial Officer, Office of Labor/Management and Employee Services, Office of Safeguards and Security and the Office of General Counsel. The FOIA/Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat shall issue a new determination that reflects the results of this additional search.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Date: June 27, 1997

(1) 1/ The Appellant initially filed a submission with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) on May 12, 1997. The OHA held the submission in abeyance for reasons explained below. We consider the Appeal to have been filed as of our June 3, 1997 receipt of her letter dated May 30, 1997 notifying this Office that she was not appealing the DOE's Privacy Act determinations. We further note that we have accepted the Appeal of the April 3, 1997 determination, despite its lack of timeliness, because of the history of this matter. The DOE's search for documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA and Privacy Act request had been assigned to different DOE offices which responded to her at different times. The Appellant was entitled to see which, if any, documents she received, before appealing the adequacy of any of the offices' searches.

(2) 2/ In her request, the Appellant referred to certain Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) documents pertaining to her which she believes are in the possession of the DOE. We note that any such documents in the possession of the DOE are subject to the FOIA. However, if the Appellant is requesting documents in the possession of the CIA (or any other federal or local agencies), she will need to make separate requests of those agencies.

(3) 3/ On May 22, 1997, the OHA requested that the Appellant supply the requested identifying information. On June 3, 1997, we received a response from the Appellant, notifying us that she declined to submit the requested information and, further, is only appealing the DOE's determinations under the FOIA, not under the Privacy Act. See Letter from Appellant to Dawn Goldstein, OHA at 3 (June 3, 1997).

We also note that although ED believes it has responded in substance to the Appellant's FOIA request, ED did not describe its response as a FOIA response nor notify the Appellant of her right to appeal its response to this Office. ED has not yet decided whether to make a formal FOIA response. See Records of Telephone Conversations between Tyrone Levi, ED, and Dawn Goldstein (June 3, 1997 and June 17, 1997); Record of Telephone Conversation between Tonya Woods, FOIA/Privacy Act Division and Dawn Goldstein (May 20, 1997). However, according to the Appellant's June 3, 1997 letter to this Office, she is not appealing ED's response.

(4) 4/ There are health units at both the Forrestal and Germantown locations of DOE. We suggest that both health units be searched for the Appellant's records.

(5) 5/ We note that the Appellant has used three names, Patricia L. Baade, Patricia L. Bryant, and P. Lee Baade, and urge the DOE offices to conduct their searches using each of the three names.

(6) 6/ The Appellant has requested that the OIG, rather than the OHA, respond to this portion of her FOIA Appeal. Under DOE regulations, OHA possesses the sole authority to process appeals of FOIA determinations, see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a), with the exception of appeals within the provisions of 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(f) (concerning classified and similar information). Accordingly, we must deny her request.

(7) 7/ "Glomar" refers to the first instance in which a Federal court upheld the adequacy of such a response. Phillippi v. CIA, 546 F.2d 1009 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (agency responded to a request for documents pertaining to a submarine-retrieval ship named the Hughes Glomar Explorer by neither confirming nor denying the existence of any such documents).

(8) 8/ Ms. Becker stated that if an OIG file does exist pertaining to the Appellant, OIG will release the contents of it, to the Appellant only, when DOE Form 1800.1 and the identifying information is submitted. Id.

(9) 9/ Exemption 7(C) of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C.§ 552(b)(7)(C), allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii).

(10) 10/ Unauthorized disclosures, in any event, would not constitute a waiver of exemption by the DOE. Simmons v. Department of Justice, 796 F.2d 709, 712 (4th Cir. 1986).

June 12, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Information Focus on Energy, Inc.

Date of Filing: May 14, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0295

On May 14, 1997, Information Focus on Energy, Inc. (IFOE) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Deputy General Counsel for Litigation (hereinafter referred to as "the Deputy Counsel"). This determination was issued on April 7, 1997 in response to a request for information submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require that a document that was released to IFOE in redacted form be released in its entirety.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its FOIA request, IFOE sought access to copies of DOE Office of General Counsel litigation summaries for 1995 and 1996 which identify litigation activities and DOE costs. In his response, the Deputy Counsel provided copies of the General Counsel Outside Contractor Litigation Cost reports for fiscal years 1995 and 1996. These reports detail costs incurred by DOE contractors in lawsuits stemming from performance of their contractual obligations. The information deleted from the copies provided to IFOE consists of the individual lawsuit settlement amounts.

In his determination, the Deputy Counsel withheld the settlement amounts pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). Specifically, the Deputy Counsel stated that the amounts are exempt from mandatory disclosure because they are privileged as attorney work product and as information relating to settlement. The Deputy Counsel also found that release of the individual settlement amounts would not be in the public interest. In this regard, the Deputy Counsel stated that disclosure of the information could compromise future settlement negotiations and inhibit communications between the government and contractor legal counsel. The Deputy Counsel added that such disclosure could also subject the DOE to legal sanctions, because the terms of at least four of the settlement agreements in question prohibit disclosure of the settlement amount.

In its appeal, IFOE argues that the Deputy Counsel's determination regarding the scope of Exemption 5 is not supported by legal precedent, and that disclosure would serve the public interest because the public has a right to know how government funds are being spent. IFOE therefore contends that the individual settlement amounts should be released unless such disclosure is proscribed by the terms of the settlement agreement.

II. Analysis

The federal courts have recognized public policy considerations favoring settlement of disputes over litigation, and the inhibiting effect that disclosure of settlement materials can have on the negotiating process. County of Madison v. United States Dep't of Justice, 641 F.2d 1036, 1042 (1st Cir. 1981); Murphy v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 571 F.Supp. 502 (D.D.C. 1983)(Murphy). In Murphy, the court stated that revealing settlement information "would decrease the likelihood that future claims . . . will be resolved by negotiation rather than by litigation, and would therefore defeat the public policy which favors compromise over confrontation." 571 F.Supp. at 506 (citations omitted). For the reasons that follow, we find that the Deputy Counsel properly determined that the withheld settlement amounts are exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5.

Exemption 5 protects from mandatory disclosure "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). The U.S. Supreme Court has held that this exemption incorporates every civil discovery privilege which the government enjoys under statutory and case law. United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 465 U.S. 792, 799 (1984); FTC v. Grolier, 103 S. Ct. 2209 (1983) (Grolier). See also Peter T. Torell, 15 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1987) (Torell). Therefore, any material that is privileged in civil discovery is also shielded from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 5. Accordingly, if the settlement amounts fall within a civil discovery privilege, they may be withheld under Exemption 5.

As previously stated, the Deputy Counsel relied upon the attorney work product and settlement negotiations privileges in withholding the settlement amounts. The attorney work product privilege serves to "provide working attorneys with a ?zone of privacy' within which to think, plan, weigh facts and evidence . . . , and prepare legal theories." Coastal States Gas Corp. v. DOE, 617 F.2d 854, 864 (D.C. Cir. 1980). This privilege is applicable to material that was prepared by an attorney "in contemplation of litigation," id., including information relating to possible settlements of litigation. See, e.g., United States v. Metropolitan St. Louis Sewer Dist., 952 F.2d 1040, 1045 (8th Cir. 1992). The settlement amounts at issue here resolved cases in which DOE contractors were parties and for which contractors would ultimately seek reimbursement for costs related to the case from the DOE pursuant to contractual provisions. In some cases the DOE was also a named party to the litigation. In all cases, the contractual provisions required that to ensure reimbursement of the litigation costs and settlement amounts by the DOE, the contractor seek approval from the DOE of any settlement amounts and accordingly, share litigation and settlement strategies with DOE attorneys. We conclude that the amounts are clearly attorney work product.

The federal courts have also recognized a civil discovery privilege for information relating to settlement negotiations. See, e.g., Olin Corp. v. Insurance Co. of North America, 603 F. Supp. 445, 449 (S.D.N.Y 1985). The OHA has also determined that settlement negotiations materials are exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5. Torell, Cities Service Oil & Gas Corp., 17 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,508 (1988). In reaching this determination, we recognize that the privilege exists in considerable part to encourage full disclosure between the parties involved in order to promote settlements rather than protracted litigation. Id. We therefore conclude that the Deputy Counsel properly determined that the settlement amounts are exempt from mandatory disclosure.

B. Public Interest Determination

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We find that release of the withheld material would not be in the public interest. In its Appeal, IFOE argues that the withheld information should be released because the public has a considerable interest in knowing how much in federal funds was used to settle litigation. However, in his determination, the Deputy Counsel provided IFOE with the totals of the settlement amounts approved in both FY 1995 and FY 1996. In addition, the settlement amount in one case, Day v. NLO, was released to IFOE. (1) This amount, $20,000,000, accounts for more than 50 percent of the total expenditures for settlements during those two fiscal years. Therefore, the Deputy Counsel's response has substantially satisfied the public interest concerns regarding the expenditure of taxpayer funds.

Furthermore, the release of additional individual settlement amounts would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the attorney work product and settlement negotiation privileges. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (in order to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeably harm basic institutional interests that underlie Exemption 5). As Justice Brennan stated in Grolier, "It would be of substantial benefit to an opposing party (and of corresponding detriment to an agency) if the party could obtain work product generated by the agency in connection with earlier, similar litigation against other persons . . . [H]e could gain insight into the agency's general strategic and tactical approach to deciding . . . on what terms [lawsuits] may be settled." Grolier, 103 S. Ct. 2209 at 2216 (Brennan, J., concurring). The settlement amounts at issue here were negotiated in recent cases that involved issues that are the subject of frequent litigation involving the DOE (e.g., torts, labor relations and contractual disputes). The release of these amounts could compromise the DOE's efforts at negotiating future settlements in similar cases.

C. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the Deputy Counsel correctly determined that the settlement amounts are exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5, and that release of the information would not be in the public interest. IFOE's appeal will therefore be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That

(1) The Appeal filed by Information Focus on Energy, Inc. on May 14, 1997 is hereby denied.

June 17, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Dennis J. McQuade

Date of Filing: May 20, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0297

On May 20, 1997, Dennis J. McQuade filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on May 7, 1997, by the Oak Ridge Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE/OR). In his Appeal, Mr. McQuade asserts, among other things, that DOE/OR failed to provide him with all documents in its possession responsive to a request he filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Parts 1004 and 1008.

I. Background

In his April 2, 1997 request, Mr. McQuade requested from DOE/OR copies of all information placed in his DOE Personnel Security File from April 1996 to the date of his request. Letter from Dennis J. McQuade to Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR. Mr. McQuade also asked that if certain specified documents was not located in his Personnel Security File, he be apprised and the request forwarded to DOE Headquarters. Id. On May 7, 1997, DOE/OR issued a determination with which it enclosed what it states were all documents contained in his Personnel Security File in existence from the date of April 1996 to the date of Mr. McQuade's request. Letter from Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR, to Dennis McQuade (May 7, 1997); Electronic mail from Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR to Steven Goering, DOE Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (May 29, 1997). In addition, because the information specified by Mr. McQuade was not located in this file, DOE/OR informed Mr. McQuade that his request was forwarded to DOE Headquarters for a search for these documents. Finally, DOE/OR explained to Mr. McQuade that because investigations into his background were performed by the Office of Personnel Management, DOE/OR forwarded a copy of his request to the OPM and asked that office to correspond directly with him concerning the request. Letter from Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR, to Dennis McQuade (May 7, 1997) at 1. In his Appeal, Mr. McQuade states that there are a number of documents that he has reason to believe are contained in his Personnel Security File, but which were not released to him by DOE/OR. The appellant requests that these documents be provided to him. Appeal at 1. Mr. McQuade also requests in his Appeal information concerning the documents that he received in response to his request, and questions the accuracy of certain information contained in the documents released to him. Id. at 1-2.

II. Analysis

As an initial matter, it will be helpful to clearly define the issues that are properly within the scope of the present Appeal. The DOE Privacy Act regulations state that "[a]ny individual may appeal the denial of a request made by him for information about or access to or correction or amendment of records." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.11. The DOE FOIA regulations provide that a requester may file an Appeal of a determination "[w]hen the Authorizing Official has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request . . . , or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees . . . ." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8. In the present case, Mr. McQuade requested copies of the contents of his Personnel Security File. DOE/OR clearly did not deny this request, but instead provided in their entirety what it states were all documents responsive to the request.

We have, however, interpreted the DOE FOIA regulations to allow for an Appeal by a requester based upon a claim that the search for documents responsive to the request was not adequate. Though Mr. McQuade does not make this claim explicitly, it is the only basis upon which we have jurisdiction to consider his Appeal. We will therefore treat Mr. McQuade's submission as an Appeal of the adequacy of DOE/OR's search for responsive documents.

A. Adequacy of DOE/OR's Search

The Privacy Act requires each federal agency to, inter alia, permit an individual to gain access to information about that individual which is contained in any "system of records" maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d); 10 C.F.R. § 1008.6(a)(2). The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. Generally, a FOIA search is a broad, all-encompassing search that would identify any documents also subject to a Privacy Act analysis. Anibal L. Taboas, 25 DOE ¶ 80,207 at 80,775 (1996). Thus, we will analyze this case under FOIA principles. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

In the present case, Mr. McQuade requested the contents of his Personnel Security File. Thus, in response to this request, DOE/OR was only required to search in that file. DOE/OR has informed us that it did search Mr. McQuade's file, and that "[a]ll documents in existence from the date of April 1996 to the date of Mr. McQuade's request that resided within his official personnel security file were provided in their entirety." Electronic mail from Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR to Steven Goering, DOE Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (May 29, 1997). We therefore must conclude that DOE/OR's search was adequate in response to Mr. McQuade's request.

Mr. McQuade's assertion that other documents should be in his file is not relevant to our determination because such a claim concerns documents that were not in that file (even though Mr. McQuade believes they should have been), and therefore fall outside the scope of his request. If Mr. McQuade believes that there are documents concerning him in the possession of the DOE other than those in his Personnel Security File at DOE/OR, he may file a request for those documents.(1) He may not, however, broaden the scope of his original request in an Appeal to this office. F.A.C.T.S., 26 DOE ¶ 80,132 at 80,578 (1996); Energy Research Found., 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529-30 (1992).

Finally, in his Appeal Mr. McQuade requested information concerning the documents that he received in response to his request. With respect to some of these documents, Mr. McQuade wants to know who put the documents into his file and why they were put there. Appeal at 1. Mr. McQuade also questions the accuracy of specific information contained in the documents released to him. Id. at 2. The FOIA and Privacy Act do not require agencies to answer questions posed by requesters. Mr. McQuade does have the right under the Privacy Act to request "that information about him . . . in a DOE system of records be amended or corrected," 10 C.F.R. § 1008.6, and he may wish to file a request to amend or correct the records he recently received from DOE/OR. However, until DOE/OR has had an opportunity to respond to such a request, we cannot address that issue in an Appeal decision. If Mr. McQuade files a request for amendment or correction, and that request is denied, he certainly may file an Appeal with this office.

III. Conclusion

Based on the information provided to us, we have no doubt that DOE/OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover material responsive to Mr. McQuade's request. Accordingly, the present Appeal will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Dennis J. McQuade, Case Number VFA- 0297, is hereby denied.

June 19, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Los Alamos Study Group

Case Number: VFA-0298

On June 2, 1997, the Los Alamos Study Group (the Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on May 19, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (AOO). That determination denied in part a request for information which the Appellant filed on August 15, 1996, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

In its August 15, 1996 FOIA Request, the Appellant sought Conceptual Design Plans (CDPs) for twelve different projects, one of which was the Los Alamos Neuron Science Center (LANSC) upgrades. In the May 19, 1997 determination, AOO found that no CDP had ever been executed for the LANSC upgrades. Accordingly, it indicated that there were no responsive records to that item of the Appellant's request.

In its Appeal, the Appellant accepts the statement that no CDP exists for the LANSC upgrades. However, it requests as alternative relief, "all equivalent documentation, including, but not limited to, conceptual plans, designs, reports, and descriptions of Department of Defense-funded activities, either current or planned at LANSC." Such documents, if they exist, are clearly outside the scope of the Appellant's intial FOIA request and the OHA will not consider this request in the context of the present Appeal. Cox Newspapers, 22 DOE ¶ 80,106 at 80,512 (1992) ("The OHA does not permit FOIA appellants to broaden their requests for information in an appeal.") Therefore, the Appellant should file a new request for this information. The present Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Los Alamos Study Group on June 2, 1997, Case Number VFA-0298, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers

Case Number: VFA-0299

On June 2, 1997, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on April 28, 1997, by the Savannah River Operations Office (SR) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination was issued in response to a request for information submitted by IBEW under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, IBEW asserts that SR failed to provide it with responsive documents in its possession regarding a Request for Information it made on July 16, 1996.

I. Background

On July 16, 1996, IBEW filed a request for information in which it sought material regarding union-related activities at SR. SR issued two determinations regarding this request on October 10, 1996, and November 8, 1996, and IBEW appealed SR's final responses to the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) on December 12, 1996. In those determinations, SR partially granted IBEW's request for information and released numerous documents responsive to IBEW's request. On Appeal, IBEW clarified its initial request and OHA remanded the clarified request back to SR for a further search of responsive documents. See I.B.E.W., 26 DOE ¶ 80,153 (1997). SR's clarified request sought the following additional information:

1. An accurate accounting of all moneys, materials, time, lost productivity, etc., associated with WSRC [Westinghouse Savannah River Company] "anti- Union" or union related training for supervisors and informational meetings with the nonexempt employees and how WSRC passed on those expenses to the DOE.
2. Any and all memos, correspondence, flyers, electronic mail, etc., concerning the Union and its activities, generated by DOE or its contractor WSRC in the last ten months including directives, comments, suggestions, training plans or requests for funding to conduct "anti-Union" or union-related training, including documents generated between the DOE and the contractor for Wackenhut Services Incorporated.
3. The documents concerning the account of WSRC's union-related training activities.

Determination Letter at 1.

On April 28, 1997, SR issued a determination which stated that WSRC as well as the SR program offices conducted a search of their files and found no additional documents responsive to IBEW's clarified request. Id.

On June 2, 1997, IBEW filed the present Appeal with OHA. In its Appeal, IBEW challenges the adequacy of the search conducted by SR. Specifically, IBEW argues that SR failed to provide it with information pertaining to the expenditure of government contract funds. See Appeal Letter at 1. In its Appeal, IBEW encloses an article from its May IBEW Journal regarding "the current Administration's position on organizing and federal contractors." Id. IBEW contends that this article demonstrates that its FOIA request is a serious matter and should be handled accordingly. Id. IBEW asks that the OHA direct SR to conduct a new search for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was inadequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01, modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted officials at SR to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed and to determine whether any other documents responsive to IBEW's request might exist. SR has made a concerted effort to locate documents responsive to IBEW's request. Upon receiving IBEW's clarified Request for Information, SR contacted WSRC and various SR program offices to search for additional responsive documents. The Office of General Counsel and the Human Resource Division at WSRC conducted searches of their files and were unable to locate additional documents responsive to IBEW's clarified request. Likewise, searches were conducted at several SR program offices, including the Contracts Management Division, the Office of Safeguards and Security, the Human Resources Office, the Training Office and the Office of the Chief Financial Officer. None of these offices was able to locate additional responsive documents. Given the facts presented to us, we find that SR conducted an adequate search which was reasonably calculated to discover additional documents responsive to IBEW's Request. The fact that the search did not uncover documents alleged to be in the possession of DOE does not mean that the search was inadequate. See Master v. F.B.I., 926 F. Supp. 193, 196 (D.D.C. 1996). In addition, the requester has not provided us with any evidence that additional responsive documents exist. See Lois Blanche Vaughan, 26 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1997). Therefore, we must deny this Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, OHA Case No. VFA-0299, on June 2, 1997, is hereby denied.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Information Focus on Energy, Inc.

Date of Filing: June 5, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0300

On June 5, 1997, Information Focus on Energy (IFOE) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Ohio Field Office. In this determination, the Ohio Office denied IFOE's request for a waiver of fees with regard to a request that it filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, IFOE asks that we grant its request for a fee waiver.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The Act also provides for the assessment of fees for the processing of requests for documents. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(I); see also 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a). For purposes of determining the appropriate fees to be charged, the FOIA sets forth four categories of requesters: commercial use requesters, educational and noncommercial scientific institutions, representatives of the news media, and all other requesters.(1) However, the DOE will grant a full or partial waiver of applicable fees if disclosure of the information sought in a FOIA request (i) is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the activities of the government, and (ii) is not primarily in the commercial interest of the requester. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii).

I. Background

In its FOIA request, IFOE sought access to all Inspector General reports, and all written observations by DOE safety and health officials, concerning the Savannah River, Fernald and Mound facilities for the year 1996. The firm requested that all fees associated with the processing of the request be waived.

In its determination, the Ohio Office classified IFOE as a commercial use requester, based primarily on its resale of documents. A commercial use requester is one who seeks information for a use or purpose that furthers the requester's commercial, trade, or profit interests. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.2(c). Accordingly, the Ohio Office determined that disclosure of the information sought in the request would primarily be in the commercial interest of IFOE, and its request for a fee waiver was denied.

In its Appeal, IFOE contests the Ohio Office's determination. As an initial matter, the firm claims that as the publisher of a monthly Internet newsletter, it should have been classified as a representative of the news media. Furthermore, IFOE contends that its request for a waiver should have been granted because release of the information would contribute significantly to the public's understanding of safety and health conditions at the named DOE facilities, and because the commercial value of the information is minimal at best.(2)

II. Analysis

A. Classification of the Requester

In order to determine whether the Ohio Field Office properly classified IFOE for purposes of the FOIA, we must first examine the nature of this requester's business. IFOE is an organization which collects information pertaining to nuclear safety issues from federal agencies and disseminates that information to the public through its monthly newsletter and through sales from a catalogue of documents set forth at IFOE's website (http://www.ifoe.com). The newsletter is made available on a subscription basis and is distributed by electronic mail. Samples of the newsletter are also available at IFOE's website. The catalogue of documents consists of documents obtained from government agencies and reproduced in their entirety in electronic form, edited versions of other documents, collections of documents pertaining to a single issue compiled by IFOE and listed in the catalogue as a single item, and IFOE assessments of some of the documents.

In National Security Archive v. U.S. Department of Defense, 880 F.2d 1381 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (National Security Archive), the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia set forth the criteria to be used in determining whether a FOIA requester should be considered a representative of the news media. In that case, the court determined that the Archive was a news media representative based largely on its publication of compilations of documents concerning national specific national security issues. In reaching this determination, the court indicated that the term "representative of the news media" should be interpreted broadly. 880 F.2d at 1386. Specifically, the court stated that a news media representative "gathers information of potential interest to a segment of the public, uses its editorial skills to turn the raw materials into a distinct work, and distributes that work to an audience." Id. at 1387. See also Glen Milner, 21 DOE ¶ 80,116 (1991).

We believe that IFOE satisfies these criteria and is therefore a news media representative for purposes of the FOIA. The requester gathers information of potential interest to its customers through FOIA requests, attendance at public meetings and agency announcements, uses its editorial skills to publish that information in the form of a newsletter, and distributes the newsletter to its subscribers by way of electronic mail. Documents obtained through the FOIA are first examined to determine whether they contain information that is deemed worthy of inclusion in the newsletter. See memorandum of July 1, 1997 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Lewis G. Hulman, Professional Engineer, IFOE. In this regard, IFOE's actions are analogous to those taken by any other news media representative. Then a determination is made as to whether the document is of sufficient interest to IFOE's customers to be included in some form in the company's catalogue. Id.

Furthermore, we do not believe that the sale of documents from IFOE's catalogue alters the requester's status as a representative of the news media. As previously stated, many of the items listed in the catalogue are compilations of documents relating to a single subject, abridged versions of documents, and IFOE assessments of certain documents. We find publication activities of this type to be analogous to those discussed in National Security Archive. Although IFOE does provide some documents to its customers in unaltered form, the requester has informed us that it charges 15 cents per page for these documents. See memorandum of July 1, 1997 conversation between Mr. Palmer and Mr. Kulman. This fee appears to be designed only to recoup the costs incurred by IFOE in obtaining and processing the documents.(3) We therefore conclude that, despite the provision of these documents for a fee, IFOE remains a representative of the news media.

B. Fee Waiver

As we previously stated, the DOE will grant a full or partial waiver of applicable fees if disclosure of the information sought in a FOIA request (i) is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the activities of the government, and (ii) is not primarily in the commercial interest of the requester. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii). The burden of satisfying this two-prong test is on the requester. Larson v. Central Intelligence Agency, 843 F.2d 1481, 1483 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (per curiam). The DOE has implemented the statutory standard for fee waivers in its FOIA regulations. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8). Those regulations set forth the following four factors that an agency must consider to determine whether the requester has met the first statutory fee waiver condition, i.e., whether disclosure of the requested information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of government operations or activities:

(A) the subject of the request; whether the subject of the requested records concerns "the operations or activities of the government";

(B) the informative value of the information to be disclosed; whether the disclosure is "likely to contribute" to an understanding of government operations or activities;

(C) the contribution to an understanding by the general public of the subject likely to result from disclosure; and

10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(i). Finally, in addition to satisfying these four factors, the DOE must also find that disclosure of the requested information would not be primarily in the commercial interest of the requester. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(ii). In making this determination, the DOE must, in most cases, consider whether the requester has a commercial interest that would be furthered by the requested disclosure, and, if so, whether that commercial interest outweighs the public interest in disclosure.

In its determination, the Ohio Office found that IFOE's commercial interest outweighed the public interest in disclosure, and that therefore the firm's fee waiver request should be denied. However, we have previously determined that in cases involving news media requesters, the DOE may not consider the commercial interests of the requester in determining whether a fee waiver should be granted. David DeKok, 23 DOE ¶ 80,115 (1993). In this regard, the DOE's FOIA regulations state that "a request for records supporting the news dissemination function ... will not be considered to be a request for commercial use." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(b)(3). In addition, the D.C. Circuit Court held in National Security Archive that representatives of the news media have no commercial interest in information requested under the FOIA in support of their news gathering functions, even though they expect to turn a profit on their publication activities. National Security Archive, 880 F.2d at 1387-88. Because the Ohio Office's denial was based solely on its finding that IFOE's commercial interests outweighed the public interest in disclosure, that determination cannot stand.

Although we have found that the Ohio Office's fee waiver determination was incorrect, we do not have sufficient knowledge of the contents of the documents in question to conduct a de novo determination on the merits of IFOE's fee waiver request. Because the documents are in the possession of the Ohio Office, we will remand this matter so that Office may apply the fee waiver criteria set forth at 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(i)(A)-(D) to IFOE's request. If, upon remand, the Ohio Office determines that IFOE is not entitled to a complete waiver of fees, the fees assessed should be determined with reference to IFOE's status as a member of the news media.

(1) The Appeal filed by the Information Focus On Energy on June 5, 1997, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Officer of the Ohio Field Office, who shall promptly issue a new fee waiver determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in this Decision and Order.

(1)Educational and non-commercial scientific institutions and news media requesters are charged only for the actual costs of reproducing responsive documents, excluding charges for the first 100 pages. Commercial use requesters are charged an amount equal to the full direct costs of searching for, reviewing and duplicating the documents sought. All other requesters are charged an amount equal to the full reasonable direct cost of searching for and reproducing records, except that the first two hours of search time and the first 100 pages of document reproduction are furnished without charge. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(b).

(2)IFOE also argues that the DOE employee who made the determination regarding the firm's fee waiver request is not a Freedom of Information Officer and is therefore not authorized to make such determinations. We reject this contention. See April 1, 1997 memorandum from GayLa Sessoms, Director, FOIA/Privacy Act Division, Office of the Executive Secretariat, to J. Phillip Hamric, Manager, Ohio Field Office (designating the particular DOE employee as the FOIA Officer for the Ohio Field Office).

(3)Compare this fee with IFOE's per-year newsletter subscription rates of $50 (when provided via electronic mail) and $100 (via the U.S. Postal Service).

July 21, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Nevada Indian Environmental Coalition

Date of Filing: June 6, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0301

On June 6, 1997, the Nevada Indian Environmental Coalition (NIEC) filed an Appeal from an April 18, 1997 determination by the Director of the Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat (Director) of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the Director partially granted a request for information the Appellant made under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, the NIEC asks that we order the Director to conduct a new search for responsive material.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest and not contrary to other laws. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information, the NIEC sought copies of documents pertaining to the transportation of spent nuclear fuel from foreign sources across the northern part of Nevada. In her determination letter, the Director enclosed copies of several documents, but also stated that the DOE did not have responsive documents for the following three NIEC document requests:

1. List of all funding for any purpose relating to these particular shipments [of spent nuclear fuel] provided by DOE to government entities, including Tribes, states and local governments, showing the amounts given to each entity.
2. Resumes of all DOE personnel involved in working with the Tribes in Nevada concerning these shipments [of spent nuclear fuel].
3. Copy of the Draft Environmental Impact Statement (EIS).

In its appeal, NIEC argues that the Director should have documents responsive to the above-mentioned requests and the Director should release them.

With regard to the request for a list of all funding, the NIEC states that it has reason to believe that the Shoshone-Bannock Tribe received funding concerning shipments of spent nuclear fuel. Thus, the NIEC believes that documents must exist concerning this transaction. Furthermore, the NIEC states that the Director acknowledged in her determination letter that the Western Governors Association received funds and that the DOE failed to provide copies to the NIEC showing the amount of these funds. Also, the NIEC contends that the DOE did not, in good faith, search for the requested information and that the DOE improperly withheld responsive information.

The NIEC also argues that the DOE should provide it with the "credentials of the experts" working with Tribes concerning the shipment of radioactive materials. The NIEC contends that if the DOE conducted a good faith search for resumes of DOE personnel, the DOE would have found responsive documents. Finally, the NIEC states that on April 21, 1995, the DOE published a draft EIS that it should have provided to many of the member NIEC Tribes for comments pursuant to federal laws and the Code of Federal Regulations. The NIEC states that none of its member Tribes received a draft of the EIS or a request for comments. Also, the NIEC states that it is illogical to believe that the DOE destroyed all of its copies of the draft EIS, since information contained in a draft EIS would not appear in the final version. Thus, the NIEC contends that the DOE must have this important information on file and that the DOE would have found a draft EIS if it had conducted a good faith search.

II. Analysis

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted a knowledgeable representative of the DOE Office of Environmental Management to ascertain the validity of the NIEC's contention that there exist documents concerning funding related to spent nuclear fuel provided by the DOE to government entities, including Tribes, states and local governments.(1) The DOE representative informed us that the DOE possesses a document responsive to the NIEC request.(2) This document is a record of the $250,000 grant that the DOE made to the Western Governors Association. Accordingly, we will remand this matter to the Director to release the responsive document or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

In the NIEC's Appeal and in discussions we had with the NIEC regarding its Appeal, the NIEC amended its request for resumes.(3) An NIEC representative stated that the NIEC is not interested only in resumes of personnel involved in working with the Tribes in Nevada concerning spent fuel shipments. Instead, the NIEC stated that it seeks employment background information for these individuals regardless of the source. The NIEC states this is the type of employment background information that can be found in SF-171 forms and that it does not wish to have any personal information about the employee, such as a social security number or any addresses. While the Director's response to the NIEC's request for resumes was not erroneous and we are not obligated to allow the NIEC to modify its request on appeal, since we are remanding the matter, as discussed above, we will request that the Director review the NIEC's amended request for information and send to the NIEC any documents responsive to the request for employment background information she may find or state the reasons why any responsive documents are exempt from mandatory disclosure.

With respect to the draft EIS requested by the NIEC, we have confirmed that the DOE's Office of NEPA Policy and Assistance has a copy of the draft EIS.(4) Thus, we will direct the Director to release the draft EIS or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any portion of the document.(5)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Nevada Indian Environmental Coalition on June 6, 1997, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Director of the Freedom of Information Act and Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat of the Department of Energy, who shall release a copy of the record of the $250,000 grant that the DOE made to the Western Governors Association or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information. In addition, the Director should consider the Nevada Indian Environmental Coalition's amended request for employment background information of the type that can be found in SF-171 forms and send to the NIEC any responsive information she may find or state the reasons why any responsive documents are exempt from mandatory disclosure. Finally, the Director shall release a copy of the "Draft Environmental Impact Statement on a Proposed Nuclear Weapons Nonproliferation Policy Concerning Foreign Research Reactor Spent Nuclear Fuel" (DOE/EIS-0218-D) or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

July 11, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Pedro Aponte Vazquez

Case Number: VFA-0302

On June 16, 1997, Pedro Aponte Vazquez (Aponte) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him in response to a request for documents submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004 and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. The determination was issued on May 15, 1997 by DOE's Chicago Operations Office (DOE/CH). This Appeal, if granted, would require that DOE/CH perform another search for responsive documents.

I. Background

On August 30, 1995, Aponte filed a request with DOE's Office of the Secretary for "copies of documents regarding the medical, scientific, and experimental work of Dr. Cornelius Packard Rhoads for the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission (1945-1959)." Letter from Aponte to Hazel O'Leary, DOE (August 30, 1995). DOE's FOIA/Privacy Act Group (DOE/HQ) acknowledged receipt of the request on September 28, 1995, and searched the files of the History Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat and the Coordination and Information Center (CIC) in Nevada. During the search, DOE/HQ learned that Dr. Rhoads(1) had been involved with cancer research at Memorial Hospital(2) in New York. DOE/HQ then transferred the request to DOE/CH to perform a further search because DOE/CH was responsible for the administration of contracts with MSK. On November 4, 1996, DOE/HQ issued a final determination, concluding that no responsive records were found at headquarters. Along with the letter, DOE/HQ enclosed a list of documents available at CIC. On November 14, 1996, DOE/CH issued a final determination stating that no records exist regarding Memorial Hospital in New York. Aponte responded to DOE/CH in writing, referring to mention of total body irradiation (TBI) (3) experiments at Memorial Hospital in the Final Report of the Advisory Committee on Human Radiation Experiments (October 1995) [hereinafter Final Report]. He also expanded his request to include "documents of any kind pertaining directly or indirectly to such scientific work, from 1945 to 1959, even if no evidence exists that Dr. Rhoads was involved in them in any fashion." Letter from Aponte to Group Manager, Acquisition and Assistance, DOE/CH (November 20, 1996).

On May 2, 1997, DOE/CH acknowledged receipt of Aponte's November 20, 1996 letter, and apologized for the delay in receiving his request. DOE/CH conducted a search of MSK contracts in its office, but could not find any documents relating to TBI. Letter from DOE/CH to Aponte (May 15, 1997). On June 16, 1997, Aponte filed this Appeal of DOE/CH's final determination.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents. Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). Accord Oglesby v. Department of the Army, 920 F.2d 57, 68 (D.C. Cir. 1990); Master v. F.B.I., 926 F.Supp. 193, 196 (D.D.C. 1996) (Master). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985) (Miller); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we first contacted DOE/CH to ascertain the scope of the search. The Contracts Division of DOE/CH promptly sent us copies of supporting documentation, including correspondence with the requester and internal memoranda relating to the searches performed. After a review of the file and conversations with employees at DOE/CH, it appears that the search focused on two areas: (1) current MSK research grants were reviewed for any responsive material, and (2) historical records were searched for responsive material relating to Memorial Hospital.

A. Search of Current MSK Research Grants

Two employees of DOE/CH were assigned to search the three active and one inactive MSK research grants currently administered by their office. They examined nine files of a 1986 MSK contract and found no reference to TBI, but admitted that they did not understand the technical jargon and had only perused the first few pages of each file. In addition, they did not know the meaning of TBI and were unable to locate the Final Report reference that Aponte submitted as evidence of TBI research at Memorial Hospital. Memorandum from David Ramirez (undated). We easily found the Final Report reference on the Office of Human Radiation Experiments (OHRE) web site, along with an entire chapter entitled "What is TBI?" Final Report, Chapter 8.(4) The employees readily admitted their lack of familiarity with the subject area, and referred the request to two scientists experienced with MSK research grants.

Both scientists in the Office of Energy Research (DOE/ER) stated that the current MSK research grants did not involve TBI. One wrote that the current grants were "non-existent during the period 1945 to 1959." Memorandum from Dr. Prem Srivastava, DOE/ER to David Ramirez (May 13, 1997). The oldest of the active grants could only be traced as far back as a parent grant initiated in 1977, many years after Memorial Hospital ceased to exist. Id. In addition, the Final Report explains that TBI research substantially decreased after the mid-1970s. Final Report, Chapter 8. Thus, we find that the scientists' statements are credible and their search was adequate.

B. Search for Historical Records of Memorial Hospital

Various groups in DOE/CH searched for records of Memorial Hospital, but found none. An employee of the Acquisition and Assistance Group was able to find a reference to two boxes containing files for Memorial Hospital, but these boxes were "closed out" in 1983 and destroyed in 1989. We contacted this group again to discuss the search and determine if any records from 1945 to 1959 might still exist. DOE/CH informed us that when files are no longer used on a regular basis, they are "closed out," or retired, and moved to an interim facility for destruction at the end of the retention period (six years and three months). An employee who uses the records storage facility told us that, although some records older than six years and three months do exist, the oldest records she has seen in the storage room are from the 1970s. Thus, it is highly likely that records of TBI research at Memorial Hospital from 1945 to 1959 were destroyed many years ago. DOE/CH believes, and we agree, that a search of the entire facility would not only be unreasonably burdensome, but would also be unlikely to locate any responsive material. See Lois Blanche Vaughan, 26 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1997) (unreasonable burden to require agency to search thousands of files for records that are not likely to exist); Nation Magazine v. U.S., 71 F.3d 885, 892 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (concurring with the district court's determination that a request to search 23 years of unindexed files would impose an unreasonable burden on an agency).

Therefore, we find that DOE/CH performed a search reasonably calculated to uncover material relating to TBI research at Memorial Hospital from 1945 to 1959. The office reviewed current grants with MSK, the successor to Memorial Hospital, and also looked for documents referring to Memorial Hospital during those years. Because DOE/CH has a policy of destroying unused documents after six years and three months, we find no reason to expect DOE/CH to retain Memorial Hospital records for over 40 years. Accordingly, this Appeal is denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Pedro Aponte Vazquez on June 16, 1997, OHA Case Number VFA-0302, is hereby denied.

(3)Medically administered total-body irradiation involves the use of external radiation sources that produce penetrating rays of energy to deliver a relatively uniform amount of radiation to the entire body. Final Report, Chapter 8. TBI was used as a medical treatment prior to becoming the focus of experimentation from 1944 to 1974, and is still used today. By the late 1940s, TBI was accepted as a treatment for certain cancers. In the 1950s, chemotherapy was risky and only marginally effective against some cancers, so interest in TBI continued. However, this interest waned by the late 1960s as chemotherapy became more effective.

July 8, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Mary J. Griffin Barnett

Date of Filing: June 9, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0303

On June 9, 1997, Mary J. Griffin Barnett filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her on May 22, 1997 by the Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned a request for information submitted by Ms. Barnett pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, OR would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

In a December 18, 1996 letter, Ms. Barnett requested from DOE Headquarters any information pertaining her mother, Lillie Cora Griffin (Mrs. George B. Griffin). In her request, Ms. Barnett stated that sometime during 1948, 1949 or 1950, her mother was ill and a patient at a Harlan, Kentucky hospital.(1) In support of her belief that a DOE facility at Oak Ridge has records responsive to her request, Ms. Barnett related the following account of her mother's illness. She and her father were informed by her mother's physician that he was making arrangements to have her treated with a new drug at a government facility at Oak Ridge, Tennessee. Ms. Barnett's mother was subsequently transported to the Oak Ridge facility and was admitted for treatment. However, when Ms. Barnett and her father tried to escort her mother into the Oak Ridge facility, they were stopped and told they could not enter since Oak Ridge was a secret government facility. Ms. Barnett further stated that, after her mother's treatment at Oak Ridge, her mother could not remember much about her stay there other than she was asked to drink an "atomic cocktail."

DOE Headquarters could not find any records regarding Ms. Barnett's mother. However, since Ms. Barnett indicated in her request that her mother had been treated at Oak Ridge, DOE Headquarters suggested that Ms. Barnett contact OR and make a request for records pertaining to her mother.

On April 14, 1997, Ms. Barnett made a request for information regarding her mother to OR. The request contained Ms. Barnett's account of her mother's visit to the hospital at Oak Ridge. In a determination letter dated May 22, 1997, OR informed Ms. Barnett that it could find no information regarding Ms. Barnett's mother relating to her treatment as a patient at Oak Ridge.

OHA received Ms. Barnett's appeal of OR's determination on June 9, 1997. In her appeal, Ms. Barnett did not specifically state the grounds for her appeal but apparently challenges the adequacy of the search that was made for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted OR to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed for responsive documents. OR informed us that the Oak Ridge Institute for Nuclear Studies (ORINS) operated a hospital that treated patients from 1950 through the mid-1980s. All of the patient records of this hospital are now maintained by Oak Ridge Associated Universities. All patient records for the ORINS hospital are indexed by patient name in a computer database. This database was searched using both of the names that Ms. Barnett provided for her mother. No records were found. (2) See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Linda Chapman, OR, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (June 18, 1997). Given the above facts, we believe OR conducted an adequate search for records. The only facility which would maintain relevant records was searched using a computer database by each name Ms. Barnett provided. We believe that this search was reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents. Consequently, we must deny Ms. Barnett's appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on June 9, 1997 by Mary J. Griffin Barnett, Case No. VFA-0303, is hereby denied.

(1)Ms. Barnett attempted to obtain records from the Harlan, Kentucky hospital where her mother was initially treated but was informed such records would have been destroyed since the hospital did not retain records over 15 years old.

(2)We were also informed that during World War II, Oak Ridge maintained a hospital which treated military and civilian personnel. After World War II, this facility and its records were turned over to the city of Oak Ridge and the facility subsequently became Methodist Medical Center of Oak Ridge. However, all of its patient records from the World War II period were destroyed in a fire. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Linda Chapman, OR, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (June 18, 1997).

July 18, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Tri-State Drilling, Inc.

Case Number: VFA-0304

On June 23, 1997, Tri-State Drilling, Inc. (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on June 17, 1997 by the Department of Energy's Bonneville Power Administration (BPA). In that determination, BPA withheld several documents in response to a June 4, 1997 Request for Information filed by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the BPA to release the withheld information.

I. BACKGROUND

This Freedom of Information Act Appeal arises from a procurement action conducted by the BPA. The procurement in question was intended to obtain "Concrete Footings for Tower 110/4." Apparently the contract was awarded to the Appellant. On June 4, 1997, however, the Appellant submitted a FOIA request to BPA seeking copies of the unsuccessful bids for this contract. On June 17, 1997, BPA issued a determination in which it withheld each of the documents requested by the Appellant in their entirety under FOIA Exemption 4. BPA contended that release of the unsuccessful bids would cause substantial competitive harm to the firms that submitted the unsuccessful bids and would impair BPA's ability to obtain similar information in the future.

II. ANALYSIS

Exemption 4 permits an agency to withhold from public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, a document supplied to the DOE on a non-voluntary basis must meet the following criteria: The document must contain either (A) "trade secrets" or (B) information that is (1) "commercial or financial," (2) "obtained from a person," and (3) "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Association v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). Commercial or financial information is "confidential" for purposes of the National Parks test if disclosure of the information is likely to either impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. Id. at 770. However, information provided to the government on a voluntary basis is subject to a broader standard of confidentiality under Exemption 4. That type of information is confidential if it is the kind of information that the provider would not customarily make available to the public. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993). Information required to be submitted in order to obtain a DOE contract is considered to be submitted on a non-voluntarily basis for Exemption 4 purposes. Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993). Therefore, its withholding must be analyzed under the National Parks test.

BPA has failed to explain why it determined that release of the withheld information could reasonably be expected to cause harm to the competitive position of the unsuccessful bidders. Accordingly, we are unable to determine whether this determination was appropriate. We are similarly unable to determine BPA's rationale for concluding that release of the unsuccessful bids would impair the government's ability to obtain similar information in the future.

A determination letter must be sufficiently informative to allow the requester to ascertain whether the claimed exemptions under which the documents were withheld reasonably apply to the documents, and to formulate a meaningful appeal. See, e.g, James L. Schwab, 22 DOE ¶ 80,164 (1992); Harold Fine, 17 DOE ¶ 80,136 at 80,588 (1988); Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,527 (1984). The determination letter issued to the Appellant on June 17, 1997 by the BPA meets neither of these two requirements.

Accordingly, we are remanding this matter to the BPA. On remand, BPA should either (1) release the requested information to the Appellant or (2) provide a detailed explanation of why it found that the release of the unsuccessful bids would cause substantial competitive harm to their submitter or impair the government's ability to obtain future bids.

We note also that the unsuccessful bids were apparently withheld in their entirety. The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). However, segregation and release of non-exempt material are not necessary when it is inextricably intertwined with the exempt material, such that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the confidentiality of the withheld material. Lead Industries Association v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

It would be unusual if release of all of the information contained in the unsuccessful bids would either cause substantial competitive harm or impair the ability of the Government to obtain future bids for goods and services. However, the determination letter does not indicate that any attempt to segregate and release non-exempt information. Accordingly, on remand, BPA must conduct an additional review of any information it seeks to withhold from the Appellant in order to determine whether it contains information that can be segregated and released to the public.

III. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, we are granting this Appeal in part, and remanding it to the Bonneville Power Administration.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Tri-State Drilling, Inc., on June 23, 1997, Case Number VFA-0304, is hereby granted in part as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other aspects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Bonneville Power Administration, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: David R. Berg

Date of Filing: July 16, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0306

On July 16, 1997, David R. Berg, through his attorney, filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on May 28, 1997, by the Office of Human Resources (HR) of the Department of Energy (DOE). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008.

The Privacy Act requires each federal agency to, inter alia, permit an individual to gain access to information about that individual which is contained in any "system of records" maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d); 10 C.F.R. § 1008.6(a)(2). Also relevant to the present Appeal is the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On February 26, 1997, Mr. Berg filed a request under the provisions of the Privacy Act and the FOIA in which he sought information related to a conversation between himself and another individual. Specifically, Mr. Berg identified four documents written by employees of the Waste Policy Institute, a DOE contractor, and the DOE.

HR issued a determination on May 28, 1997, in which it stated that it located a number of documents responsive to Mr. Berg's request. However, HR withheld these documents in their entirety, citing subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act which exempts from disclosure "information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(5); 10 C.F.R. §1008.9(a)(2). HR also withheld these documents under FOIA Exemptions 5, 6 and 7 and stated that it is not in the public interest to provide the requested documents. See Determination Letter at 1.

On July 16, 1997, Mr. Berg filed the present Appeal with OHA contending: (1) that HR did not adequately explain the basis upon which the responsive documents were withheld under subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act and (2) that HR improperly relied upon FOIA Exemptions 5, 6, and 7. Mr. Berg asks that the OHA direct HR to release the responsive documents.

II. Analysis

The Privacy Act exempts from release "any information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(5). The exemption "is not limited to an attorney's work product, but extends to any records compiled by counsel or other persons in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." Hernadez v. Alexander, 671 F.2d 402, 408 (10th Cir. 1982) (citing Smietra v. Department of Treasury, 447 F. Supp. 221, 227-28 (D.D.C. 1978)). Information that is exempt from disclosure under the Privacy Act must be released to a requester unless it is also exempt from disclosure under the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(t)(2). Thus, it is the general practice of the DOE to process a request by an individual for information about that individual under both the Privacy Act and the FOIA. Even if a requester specifically requests records under the Privacy Act, it well serves administrative efficiency and the requester to process the request under the FOIA as well, rather than requiring the requester to file a separate FOIA request for the same record.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. After conducting a search for responsive documents under the FOIA, the statute requires that the agency provide the requester with a written determination notifying the requester of the results of that search, and if applicable, of the agency's intentions to withhold any of the responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(I). The statute further requires that the agency inform the requester of its right "to appeal to the head of the agency any adverse determination." Id.

The written determination letter serves to inform the requester of the results of the agency's search for responsive documents and of any withholdings that the agency intends to make. In doing so, the determination letter allows the requester to decide whether the agency's response to its request was adequate and proper and provides this office with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal.

It therefore follows that the agency has an obligation to ensure that its determination letters: (1) adequately describe the results of the searches; (2) clearly indicate which information was withheld, and (3) specify the exemption(s) under which information was withheld. Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,205 at 80,797 (1996). Without an adequately informative determination letter, the requester and the review authority must speculate about the adequacy and appropriateness of the agency's determinations. Id.

In the present case, HR withheld responsive documents under Exemptions 5, 6, and 7 of the FOIA as well as subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act. In its determination letter, HR provided Mr. Berg with generic explanations regarding the exemptions applied to the responsive documents. We find these explanations to be insufficiently informative and short of what is legally required.

It is well established that a FOIA determination must contain a reasonably specific justification for withholding material pursuant to a FOIA request. See Deborah L. Abrahamson, 23 DOE ¶ 80,147 (1993). A specific justification is necessary to allow this Office to perform an effective review of the initial agency determination and to permit the requesting party to prepare a reasoned appeal. Instead, HR has merely restated the languages of Exemptions 5, 6, and 7 as well as subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act, without adequately explaining the reasons why HR concluded that the responsive documents are exempt from disclosure under the provisions of the FOIA and the Privacy Act. Furthermore, we note that there does not appear to have been any attempt to segregate and release possibly non-exempt information from exempt information in any of the withheld documents.

Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to HR to either release to Mr. Berg all of the documents responsive to his request or to issue a new determination adequately supporting the withholding of the documents. If a new determination is issued, HR should include a statement of the reason for denial, a specific explanation of how the exemptions apply to the documents withheld and a statement why discretionary release is not appropriate. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1). HR should further review each document for the possible segregation of non-exempt material. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(3).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by David R. Berg, OHA Case No. VFA-0306, on July 16, 1997, is hereby granted in part as set forth below in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of Human Resources and Administration of the Department of Energy which shall either release the responsive documents withheld in its May 28, 1997 Determination or issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: The Cincinnati Enquirer

Case Number: VFA-0307

On July 1, 1997, The Cincinnati Enquirer (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on June 13, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Ohio Field Office (DOE/OFO). That determination denied in part a request for information submitted by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require DOE/OFO to release certain requested information.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the type of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is permitted by federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On May 14, 1997, the Appellant filed a request under the FOIA in which it sought, inter alia, copies of sole-source contracts and related procurement documents concerning the Fernald Environmental Management Project (FEMP).(1) FEMP is a DOE site currently operated under a contract between the DOE and Fluor Daniel Fernald (FDF). DOE/OFO issued a determination on June 13, 1997, in which it released some documents to the Appellant but stated that its search did not extend to the files of FDF since "[u]nder the terms of the contract between DOE and FDF, all procurement records are owned by the contractor. Until DOE acquires possession of such records, they are not agency records and, therefore, are not accessible under the FOIA." Letter from Robert D. Folker, Acting Manager, DOE/OFO, to Michael P. Gallagher, Journalist, The Cincinnati Enquirer (June 13, 1997).

In its Appeal, the Appellant argues that FDF should be considered an "agency" for FOIA purposes or, alternatively, the requested documents should be considered "agency records." It therefore asserts that DOE/OFO should be required to conduct a search of FDF and release any responsive documents. See Letter from Michael P. Gallagher to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (July 1, 1997) (Appeal Letter).

II. Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether procurement records between a DOE contractor and sub-contractor which were generated by and in the possession of that DOE contractor are subject to the FOIA. First, we must determine whether such records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). Second, records that do not meet these criteria may nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information required to be made available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-stage analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as FDF, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80, 127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA, and if not (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at ¶ 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether an entity should be regarded as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case which involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974); cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, FDF is the prime contractor responsible for maintaining and operating FEMP. The Appellant alleges that because FDF (i) has an organizational structure similar to that of governmental agencies subject to the FOIA, (ii) is subject to close governmental supervision and control, including federal audit and reporting requirements, and (iii) has the power to make its own procurement decisions, it should therefore be considered an "agency" for FOIA purposes. The Appellant relies on Dong v. Smithsonian Institution, 878 F. Supp. 244 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (Dong), for the proposition that FDF is a government agency. In that case, the D.C. Circuit found that because of the high degree of governmental control of the Smithsonian Institution, the Smithsonian should be considered an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

For several reasons, we do not find the Appellant's argument persuasive. First, FDF is in no way similar to the Smithsonian Institution, the entity involved in the case on which Appellant so heavily relies. The Smithsonian was chartered by an Act of Congress, members of its Board of Directors are federal officials or selected by governmental officials, and it has extensive financial ties to the federal government. Dong, 878 F. Supp. at 248-249. While there are extensive financial ties between FDF and DOE, the other facts are not true for FDF. Further, this Office has frequently held that management and operating contractors are not "agencies" for FOIA purposes. See, e.g., Diane C. Larson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 (1996) (Westinghouse Hanford Company); William Kuntz III, 25 DOE ¶ 80,157 (1995) (Lockheed Martin Corporation); Cowles Publishing Co., 24 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1994) (Battelle Memorial Institute). The Appellant has shown neither that these cases should be overruled nor that the present case is significantly different from them. Like those other cases, the DOE obtained FDF's services and exercises general control over the contract work, but it does not supervise FDF's day-to-day operations. Therefore, FDF does not meet the test set forth in the Orleans and Forsham decisions and we therefore conclude that FDF is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although FDF is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, its records which are responsive to the Appellant's request could become "agency records" if they were obtained by the DOE and were within the DOE's control at the time the FOIA request was made. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989) (Tax Analysts); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, the documents in question had not been obtained by the DOE and were not in the agency's possession at the time of the Appellant's request.(2)

However, the Appellant relies on Burka v. Department of Health & Human Serv., 87 F.3d 508 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (Burka) and Chicago Tribune Co. v. Department of Health & Human Serv., 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2308 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 26, 1997) (Chicago Tribune) for the proposition that the requested records are within DOE's control. In Burka, four factors were used to determine whether a record in a private contractor's possession was an "agency record" because sufficient agency control was present: (1) the intent of the document's creator to retain or relinquish control over the records; (2) the ability of the agency to use and dispose of the record as it sees fit; (3) the extent to which agency personnel have read or relied upon the document; (4) the degree to which the document was integrated into the agency's record system or files. Burka, 87 F.3d at 515. In Burka and Chicago Tribune, it is clear that the agency controlled the requested information in a myriad of ways that are not present in this case. In Burka, the agency ordered creation of the materials, planned to take physical possession at the conclusion of the project, intended to disclose the information and read and relied on the requested information to write articles and develop agency policy. In Chicago Tribune, the government ordered the contractor to produce analyses from the requested information, owned the underlying data comprising the requested information, instituted a panel to resolve ambiguities in the requested information and published articles based on the requested information. None of these control-indicating facts has been shown to be present in the case at issue. As explained infra, the procurement records relevant to this case were explicitly excluded from the DOE's ownership and ability to dispose of such records and have remained exclusively in the contractor's control. Accordingly, the requested procurement records in this case do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even if a contractor-acquired or contractor-generated record fails to qualify as an "agency record," it may still be subject to voluntary release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

We therefore next look to the contract between DOE and FDF to determine the status of the withheld records. That contract states:

Except as provided in paragraph (b) below, all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government and shall be delivered to the Government . . . .

Contract DE-AC24-92OR21972, Modification No. M053, Section H, Clause H.20. Paragraph (b) excludes from this provision "all records related to any procurement action by the contractor." Thus, because procurement records are not among the records which are property of the Government under the DOE's contract with FDF, these records are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.(3) Id. at Clause H.20(b)(7).

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the records sought by the appellant are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA, nor subject to release under DOE regulations. Accordingly, the Appeal should be denied.

(1) The Appeal filed by the Cincinnati Enquirer on July 1, 1997, Case Number VFA-0307, is hereby denied.

(2)2/ OFO has informed us that some contracts between FDF and its subcontractors over a certain dollar amount are approved by the DOE. However, all copies of such contracts are then immediately returned to the contractor. Thus, while some responsive documents may have once been in the DOE's possession, any such documents had been returned by the time of the Appellant's request. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, Office of Hearings and Appeals, and Marian Schomaker, FOIA Officer, DOE/OFO (July 8, 1997).

(3)3/ The Appellant notes that 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(3) does not affect "DOE's rights under contract to obtain any contractor records and to determine their disposition including public dissemination. " See Appeal Letter at 4 (emphasis added by OHA). However, while DOE may inspect and copy the contractor-owned documents at issue here, it has no such contractual right to dispose of the documents or to publicly disseminate them.

The Appellant also refers to the statement in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(3) that the policies stated in this paragraph "will be applied by DOE to maximize public disclosure of records that pertain to concerns about the environment. . . ." See Appeal Letter at 4. However, that statement does not confer either ownership or a right of disposition of contractor documents upon DOE. The statement is instead referring to an important DOE policy concern to be considered in the case of DOE-owned records.

August 4, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Arter & Hadden

Date of Filing: July 7, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0309

On July 7, 1997, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received an Appeal filed by Arter & Hadden (A&H), a private law firm, from a determination issued to it by the Freedom of Information Officer at the Department of Energy's (DOE) Albuquerque Operations Office (hereinafter referred to as "the Officer"). The Officer's determination was issued in response to a request for information that was submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. The Appeal, if granted, would require the Officer to conduct a further search for documents responsive to the request.

I. Background

In its FOIA request, A&H sought access to a copy of a July 10, 1974 report pertaining to the ownership of ponds at a Uranium Mill Tailings Remediation Action Project site (UMTRA site) located at Falls City, Texas, and any other documents relating to that report.(1) This report was prepared by the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC), a predecessor agency of the DOE, in conjunction with the Environmental Protection Agency and the Texas Department of Health.

In the determination, the Officer stated that the search for responsive documents encompassed the Albuquerque Office's Environmental Restoration Division (ERD) and Office of Chief Counsel, and that no documents responsive to A&H's request could be located.

In its Appeal, A&H has submitted documents that refer to the July 10, 1974 report. The appellant contends that the Albuquerque Office has jurisdiction over the UMTRA site, and that the requested document should therefore be in the possession of that Office.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. The fact that the results of a search may not meet with the requester's expectations does not necessarily mean that the search was inadequate. Robert Hale, 25 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,501 (1995). Instead, in evaluating the adequacy of a search, our inquiry generally focuses on the scope of the search that was performed. See, e.g., Richard J. Levernier, 25 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1995).

We have reviewed the scope of the search that was performed, and we find that search encompassed each part of the Albuquerque Office in which the requested report and any related documents could reasonably be expected to be found. The ERD, which had oversight responsibilities for the UMTRA site, and the Chief Counsel's Office were searched. The Chief Counsel's Office handled licensing proceedings before the Texas Department of Health. See memorandum of July 28, 1997 telephone conversation between Woody Woodworth, ERD, and Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney. Furthermore, in addition to the search described in the determination letter, the request was referred to two DOE contractors that were involved in operations at the UMTRA site. See memorandum of July 24, 1997 telephone conversation between James Snyder, Albuquerque Operations Office, and Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney. Despite these efforts, no responsive documents were found. Based on the record in this proceeding, we find that the search conducted by the Albuquerque Office was reasonably calculated to find the requested report and any related documents, and was therefore adequate. A&H's Appeal will be denied.

(1) The Appeal filed by Arter & Hadden on July 7, 1997 is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0310, 26 DOE ¶ 80,214

August 19, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Information Focus on Energy, Inc.

Date of Filing:July 22, 1997

Case Number:VFA-0310

On July 22, 1997, Information Focus on Energy, Inc. (IFE) filed an Appeal from a June 17, 1997 determination by the Director of the Office of Public Affairs (Director) of the Albuquerque Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the Director partially granted a request for information filed by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, IFE asks that we order a search for additional responsive documents. In addition, IFE requests that the DOE release the names of Sandia National Laboratories employees that the DOE redacted from documents it provided to IFE.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest and not contrary to other laws. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information, IFE sought copies of documents containing "[t]he initial written notification and/or report from Sandia National Laboratory contractor of the December 7, 1996 shutdown of the Annular Core Research Reactor" and "[a]ny Albuquerque Operations Office notes, memos, letters or electronic records reflecting initial receipt of verbal and written information of the event." In the June 17, 1997 determination letter, the Director enclosed two copies of a December 20, 1996 Occurrence Report No. ALO-KO-SNL-9000-1996-0009 (the copies originated from different offices), and a copy of a December 23, 1996 letter from Sandia National Laboratories-

New Mexico (SNL/NM) to Mike Zamorski, Area Manager of the Kirtland Area Office of the DOE, with names of SNL/NM employees deleted pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6).

In its appeal, IFE first argues that the Director did not identify any information responsive to the second item of its request for "notes, memos, letters or electronic records." IFE contends that the DOE facility representative whose name the DOE redacted in the SNL/NM letter may have made notes relating to the information in the letter. Second, IFE objects to the deletion of names. IFE argues that the DOE should release the names since the public must be able to hold Sandia employees personally and publicly accountable for potentially important safety and health infractions. IFE states that withholding names protects culpable employees and their managers when they have failed to provide adequate safety.

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of the Search

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted a representative of the Director to ascertain the validity of IFE's contention that there may exist responsive information because the Director did not address in his determination letter any information related to the portion of the IFE request concerning "Albuquerque Operations Office notes, memos, letters or electronic records." A representative for the Director informed us that, in the Director's determination letter, the Director did not separately address the second item because he believed the documents provided to IFE were responsive to both parts of IFE's request, not exclusively IFE's first item. The Director stated that he provided all of the responsive documents found after searching six Albuquerque Operations Office divisions. Since IFE has given us no further information in support of its position, and we have no reason to believe that additional responsive documents exist, we must deny this portion of IFE's Appeal.

B. Exemption 6

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982) (Washington Post). Furthermore, the term "similar files" has been interpreted broadly by the Supreme Court to include all information that "applies to a particular individual." Washington Post, 456 U.S. at 602. Pursuant to established legal precedent, there is no doubt that the names of individuals redacted in this case qualify as "similar files" under Exemption 6.

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not its disclosure of the records would invade a significant privacy interest. If the agency does not identify a privacy interest, it may not withhold the record pursuant to Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the government. See Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 773 (1989) (Reporters Comm.). See also Joyce E. Economus, 23 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1994). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

We have consistently found that names, by themselves, reveal nothing private about a person and, therefore, are not the type of information that creates a protected privacy interest for the purpose of Exemption 6. See, e.g., The News Tribune, 25 DOE ¶ 80,181 at 80,700 (1996). A privacy interest exists only when an individual's name is linked with some other piece of information that "reveals something personal about an individual." Id. at 80,699. In an Exemption 6 analysis, we must examine any linkage of information involved to determine the extent of any privacy interest. In this case, the link concerns DOE and contractor employee names and their knowledge or actions surrounding the December 7, 1996 shutdown of the Annular Core Research Reactor.

We find that the Director has not sufficiently demonstrated a link between the redacted names and any identifiable privacy interest for each of these individuals. It appears that some of the redacted names are DOE personnel whose only connection with the December 20, 1996 responsive report concerning the reactor shutdown may have been that their names were on the distribution list to receive a copy of the report. If our speculation is correct, then it would be difficult to imagine that these individuals would have an identifiable privacy interest concerning the reactor shutdown since they may have only read the report. Other redacted names appear to be of individuals who had direct knowledge of the reactor shutdown. Even these individuals must have a link to information that "reveals something personal" about them in order for there to be a privacy interest. Id. Since the Director did not articulate a privacy interest for each of the individuals whose names he redacted, we must remand this case to him to either release the names of these individuals or provide a detailed explanation for withholding that includes a description pursuant to Exemption 6 of the applicable privacy interest for each of the individuals whose names he withheld. Once the Director has performed this privacy interest analysis, he must then perform the public interest test as described above. Finally, also as described above, the Director must perform the balancing test to weigh any privacy interests he has identified against the public interest in disclosure of the names.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Information Focus on Energy, Inc. on July 22, 1997 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Director of the Office of Public Affairs of the Albuquerque Operations Office for further action in accordance with the directions set forth in this Decision.

September 11, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Greenpeace USA

Case Number: VFA-0311

On July 25, 1997, Sherry Lee Meddick (Meddick) of Greenpeace USA filed an Appeal from a determination issued on June 2, 1997 by the Department of Energy's Idaho Operations Office (DOE/ID). The determination concerned a request submitted by Meddick under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In her Appeal, Meddick requests that the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) order the release of the information withheld by DOE/ID.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.A. § 1004.10(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public, whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

Meddick, an Energy and Radioactive Waste Campaigner for Greenpeace USA, sought information from DOE/ID in a March 26, 1997 FOIA request. She wrote that DOE literature stated that "[t]he National Low Level Waste Management Program (NLLWMP) at the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory (INEL) assists the U.S. Department of Energy in fulfilling its responsibilities under the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Amendments Act of 1986 by providing technical assistance to states and compact regions as they develop new commercial low-level radioactive waste management systems." Letter from Meddick to Carl Robertson, FOIA Officer, DOE/ID (March 26, 1997) [hereinafter Request Letter]. In an effort to understand the type of assistance that INEL provides to DOE, Meddick requested that DOE/ID provide her with copies of:

"[a]ll contracts, grants and agreements for such assistance from the DOE and DOE/ID contractors to :

1. The State of California and any of its agencies or departments
2. The California Department of Health Services
3. The Southwestern Low Level Radioactive Waste Compact and the Compact

Commission

4. Any and all contractors for any of the entities listed above in (1-3)

5. Any other entities, organizations or groups not specifically listed above

Such contracts, grants, agreements by DOE may include any of the entities listed in (1-5) above or may be for work directly performed by DOE or their contractors or subcontractors."

Request Letter at 1-2.

Lockheed Martin Idaho Technologies Company (LMITCO), INEL's management contractor, performed an extensive search of its files, and forwarded responsive documents along with recommended redactions to DOE/ID. DOE/ID made further redactions. On June 2, 1997, DOE/ID sent Meddick the documents it determined to be responsive, a file index listing document folders by name and the LMITCO employees maintaining the documents, and a 25-page list describing each redaction made and exemption applied to the documents. DOE/ID withheld some material under FOIA Exemption 3 as exempt under the National Defense Authorization Act, under Exemption 4 as confidential commercial information, and under Exemption 6 as personal information the disclosure of which would invade personal privacy.(1) Letter from Carl Robertson, FOI Officer, DOE/ID to Meddick (June 2, 1997).

On July 25, 1997, Meddick filed the present Appeal requesting the release of withheld documents, removal of redactions, and explanations of seeming inconsistencies in disclosures.(2) She also included a list of 12 specific types of information desired (e.g., contract requisitions, supporting documentation, cost information, proposals, organization charts, guidelines, correspondence) and requested information on media assistance workshops conducted in California. Letter from Meddick to DOE/ID (July 25, 1997) [hereinafter Appeal]. This Appeal, if granted, would require DOE/ID to release the withheld material to Meddick.

A. Exemption 3

Exemption 3 of the FOIA allows agencies to withhold information if specifically authorized by another federal statute. An agency properly invokes Exemption 3 only where the withholding statute "(A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). A statute falls within the exemption's coverage if it satisfies either of these standards. See Long v. IRS, 742 F.2d 1173, 1178 (9th Cir. 1984). The Supreme Court has established a two-prong standard of review for Exemption 3 cases. See CIA v. Sims, 471 U.S. 159, 167 (1985); Fitzgibbon v. CIA, 911 F.2d 755, 761 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (applying the Sims test). First, the agency must determine whether the statute in question is a statute of exemption as contemplated by Exemption 3. Sims at 167. Second, the agency must determine whether the withheld material satisfies the criteria of the exemption statute.

According to DOE/ID, the withheld documents were proposals submitted in response to a competitive solicitation, and thus exempt under the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1997 (NDAA), Pub. L. No. 104-201, § 821, 110 Stat. 2609 (1996) (to be codified at 41 U.S.C. § 253b(m)). We have previously determined that the NDAA is a statute of exemption as contemplated by Exemption 3. Chemical Weapons Working Group, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,170 (1997) (Chemical Weapons). The NDAA(3) is a federal statute that contains language specifically prohibiting the FOIA official from releasing protected information. The pertinent part of the NDAA states that "[e]xcept as provided . . . , a proposal(4) in the possession or control of an executive agency may not be made available to any person under section 552 of title 5, United States Code." 110 Stat. 2609. The NDAA also declares that it "does not apply to any proposal that is set forth or incorporated by reference in a contract entered into between the agency and the contractor that submitted the proposal." Id.

To satisfy Exemption 3, the documents withheld from Meddick must meet the criteria laid out above in the NDAA. The FOI Officer informed us that the final contracts between the DOE and the various contractors do not set forth or incorporate by reference any part of the proposals submitted in response to the solicitations. Letter from FOI Officer, DOE/ID to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, Staff Attorney, OHA (August 1, 1997). We reviewed the material withheld from Meddick and found that most were proposals submitted in response to a competitive solicitation. Thus, for those proposals that meet the requirements of the statute, i.e., proposals that were submitted in response to a competitive solicitation, the FOI Officer has no discretion to release this material.

However, the FOI Officer also asserted that "[p]roposal information, whether solicited or unsolicited, sole-source or otherwise appears to be witholdable under the statute." Letter from FOI Officer, DOE/ID to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, Staff Attorney, OHA (August 1, 1997). He was joined in this opinion by the LMITCO FOI Officer, who declared that "proposal information, whether solicited or unsolicited, is withholdable under the statute." Letter from LMITCO FOI Officer to DOE/ID FOI Officer (August 7, 1997). We do not agree that the NDAA provides a blanket exemption for all proposal information. Rather, the NDAA exempts only material that was "submitted by a contractor in response to the requirements of a solicitation for a competitive proposal." 110 Stat. 2609; 41 U.S.C. § 253b(m)(3) (emphasis added). In our review, we discovered one document in File Index Number 9 referring to Unsolicited Proposal #P8509011. We find that unsolicited proposals are not covered by the NDAA. In addition, Meddick argues that many of the documents were "sole sourced at the request of the California Department of Health Services." Appeal at 4, 6. Although she has not provided us any evidence that this is true, there may be such documents and we find that the FOIA may apply to that material. According to the FOI Officer, there were no responsive sole source documents. Nonetheless, in view of the previous statements of the FOI Officers that they believe that sole source proposal information is exempt from disclosure under Exemption 3, we find that a new search should be made, keeping in mind that the NDAA exempts only proposals submitted in response to a competitive solicitation. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to DOE/ID for the release of the non-exempt portions of all relevant unsolicited or non-competitive proposals, or issuance of a justification for further withholding under any other applicable FOIA exemption.

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 1579 (1993). We have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposals. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

DOE/ID cited Exemption 4 as a basis for withholding details regarding contract cost estimating. We reviewed unredacted copies of the withheld documents and found that they contain commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. Furthermore, the submitters created and provided all these documents to the DOE specifically for the purpose of acquiring a contract. See Industrial Constructors Corporation, 25 DOE ¶ 80,196 (1996) (Industrial); Tri-City Herald, 16 DOE ¶ 80,114 (1987). The DOE also obtained this material from a "person" as required by Exemption 4, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke &

Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). We also conclude that much of the information withheld is confidential because its release would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. We have stated in the past that release of cost and financial information could be used by a competitor to undercut another firm's bids and thus effectively eliminate the disclosing firm from competition. See Industrial; International Technology Corporation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1992); U.S. Rentals, 21 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1991). In this case, were the submitter to release, for example, its labor cost estimates for completing specific tasks and reveal its unique methods and procedures to accomplish these tasks, any competitor could easily determine how to adjust its own costs and method to arrive at a lower contract price and gain unfair advantage in a future bid process. See Chemical Weapons, 26 DOE ¶ 80,170 (1997).

However, we believe that some information in these documents is not exempt. For example, File Index 7c contains a chart entitled "Independent Cost Estimate " that was withheld under Exemption 4. LMITCO recommended redacting only detailed cost breakouts for labor prior to release to Meddick. We agree that this material should be withheld. DOE/ID, however, withheld the entire chart, which also included, inter alia, travel costs and rental car prices. (In our review of the unredacted Exemption 4 material, we found that DOE/ID consistently withheld entire documents despite LMITCO's recommendation of partial redactions.) We are not convinced that release of this material would cause substantial harm to the contractors' competitive position, or impair DOE's ability to obtain such data in the future. Rental car charges, airfares, and postage are not "unique methods and procedures" that the submitters use to accomplish their tasks, nor do the contractors control these prices. If this material is non-exempt and "reasonably segregable," the FOIA requires its release. See Tri-State Drilling, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,202 (1997); Dr. A. Victorian, 25 DOE ¶ 80,166 (1994). However, we remind DOE/ID that segregation and release of non-exempt material are not necessary when it is inextricably intertwined with exempt material, such that release of the non- exempt material would compromise the confidentiality of the withheld material. Id. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to DOE/ID for review of the redacted and withheld material under the standards set forth above.

C. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations direct the DOE to release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. We have determined that Exemption 3 and the NDAA require the continued withholding of the various contractor proposals. Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information, we are not permitted such consideration where, as in the application of Exemption 3, the applicable statute requires non-disclosure.

In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we also do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Greenpeace on July 25, 1997, Case No. VFA-0311, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Act Officer of the DOE/ID who will promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

(2)LMITCO indicated that some information was released in error. Letter from Dale Claflin, FOIA Officer, LMITCO, to FOI Officer, DOE/ID (August 7, 1997). DOE/ID is currently reviewing alleged inconsistencies in its disclosure of contractor fees, and will respond to the requester directly. In response to allegations of illegible copies and missing materials, DOE/ID will send Meddick the missing material and the best available copies of the illegible documents. Letter from FOI Officer, DOE/ID, to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (August 1, 1997).

(3)Meddick contends that the NDAA only applies to defense acquisitions. We reject this interpretation. In fact, the introduction to the law declares that it authorizes appropriations for the fiscal year 1997 defense activities of the Department of Energy. 110 Stat. 2422. The statute itself contains subsections pertaining to both civilian and armed forces acquisitions. NDAA at 110 Stat. 2609.

(4)The NDAA defines a proposal as "any proposal, including a technical, management, or cost proposal, submitted by a contractor in response to the requirements of a solicitation for a competitive proposal." 110 Stat. 2609; 41 U.S.C. § 253b(m)(3) (emphasis added).

August 8, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Charles L. Wilkinson, III

Date of Filing: July 14, 1997

On July 14, 1997, Charles L. Wilkinson (Wilkinson) filed an Appeal from a final determination the Savannah River Operations Office (SR) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him on June 11, 1997. In that determination, SR partially granted a request for information that Wilkinson filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

I. Background

In his request for information, Wilkinson sought all records in 70 categories of information relating to the utilization of non-union labor at the landfill and the "D-Area Powerhouse" at the DOE's Savannah River Site near Aiken, South Carolina, as well as information regarding layoffs and cost savings effected at those sites.(1) In its final determination, SR identified over 500 responsive documents and released numerous documents in their entirety. SR withheld portions of 21 documents pursuant to Exemptions 3, 4, 5 and 6. SR also withheld 69 documents in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. With regard to the documents withheld in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5, SR stated that these documents are predecisional documents protected by the deliberative process privilege and that the public interest in disclosure would be outweighed by the chilling effect such disclosure would have on the willingness of DOE or DOE contractor employees to make honest and open recommendations in the future. In addition, for 33 of the categories of requested information, SR did not provide a list of any responsive documents.

In his Appeal, Wilkinson challenges the determination made regarding 17 of the documents withheld in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. (2) Specifically, Wilkinson asserts that one of the documents, Document No. 3/5, appears to be the minutes of a public meeting and can not be a predecisional deliberative document. Another document, Document No. 3/23, Wilkinson goes on to state, appears to be related to minutes of a "public authority" and thus was improperly withheld. With regard to Document No. 45/4, Wilkinson asserts that this draft letter was sent to the addressee, Mr. Edgar West, and that since the draft letter was deemed important enough to keep it should be provided to him. Additionally, Wilkinson asserts that SR withheld Document Nos. 64/1, 64/2, 64/5, 64/15, 64/16, 64/18, 64/21, 64/28, 64/29 and 64/30, all inter-office memoranda, simply to prevent embarrassment due to their subject matter. With regard to the remaining withheld documents, Wilkinson argues that each is directly relevant to his request and should thus be released. Wilkinson also challenges the adequacy of the search made for 17 categories of requested documents. (3)For these categories, Wilkinson states that SR did not issue any response regarding the existence of responsive documents in its final determination letter.

II. Analysis

A. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

(i) Document Nos. 3/19, 3/23, 11/1a.1, 19/2, 45/4, 64/1, 64/2, 64/5, 64/15, 64/16, 64/18, 64/21, 64/28, 64/29 and 64/30

With regard to Document Nos. 3/19, 3/23, 11/1a.1, 19/2, 45/4 64/1, 64/2, 64/5, 64/15, 64/16, 64/18, 64/21, 64/28, 64/29 and 64/30, we have reviewed each of these documents and find that they contain information that is predecisional and deliberative pursuant to Exemption 5. As discussed below, each of these documents contains opinions of various DOE employees, the disclosure of which would discourage open, frank discussions by these individuals. Nevertheless, each of these documents, with the exception of Document No. 11/1a.1, also has a small amount of releasable information such as memorandum headings and/or segregable non-deliberative factual information. On remand, SR must release this information or provide a detailed explanation for its withholding. Because we have determined that Exemption 5 was properly applied to most of the material in these documents, we must reject Wilkinson's argument that no valid reason exists to withhold these documents.

Document No. 3/19 contains a summary of a committee meeting of DOE personnel at which comments were made regarding the suitability of various sites at SR for construction of a landfill and related facilities. Document No. 3/23 consists of an inter-office memorandum titled "Subject: Meeting Minutes" regarding a meeting a DOE employee had with the TRA and the Lower Savannah Council of Governments (LSCOG) and the events that transpired at that meeting. Wilkinson is correct that Document No. 3/23 discusses a meeting involving a public agency. However, this document also contains the DOE employee's impressions and opinions regarding various TRA proposals regarding the creation of a regional landfill on property supplied by DOE. These opinions are predecisional and deliberative and protected by Exemption 5. Document No. 19/2 contains a DOE employee's opinion regarding the potential effect on DOE contractor employee jobs of the DOE privatizing power production at SR. In sum, each of the documents described above is predecisional and deliberative.

Document Nos. 64/2 and 64/5 contain DOE employee opinions concerning the possible involvement of the State of South Carolina in regulating OSHA functions at the D-Area Powerhouse. Document Nos. 64/16, 64/18 and 64/21 contain DOE employee comments and opinions regarding issues pertaining to privatizing the SR Powerplant operations. Document Nos. 64/1, 64/28, 64/29 and 6/30 contain DOE employee comments and opinions regarding various potential environmental issues involving the D-Area Powerhouse. Document No. 6/15 contains comments from a DOE employee regarding a proposed draft version of a lease agreement with SCE&G. All of these documents are clearly predecisional and deliberative in their nature and their release could inhibit honest communication and evaluations by DOE employees in the future.

Document Nos.11/1a.1 and 45/4 are draft copies of various documents. Document No. 11/1a.1 is a draft of a proposed cost sharing agreement to be entered into between the DOE and the TRA to establish a waste management center. This cost sharing agreement, as described by Document No. 11/1a.1, was not adopted into a final agreement. As such, Document No. 11/1a.1 consists of a proposed version of a cost sharing agreement. Thus, the entire document represents a predecisional, deliberative, recommendation that is protected by Exemption 5. Document No. 45/4 is a draft of a letter to be sent to Edgar West pertaining to the applicability of the Davis-Bacon Act (DBA) to projects at DOE's Savannah River Site. This document presents analysis regarding whether different projects fall within the ambit of the DBA. The letter, contrary to Mr. Wilkinson's assertion, was never put in final form to be sent to the addressee. Thus, the analysis represents a predecisional, deliberative, recommendation as to the DOE's position at the time of the draft letter regarding the applicability of the DBA. However, this draft document does contain segregable non-deliberative factual material that SR should release or provide a detailed explanation for withholding. See Anibal L. Taboas, 25 DOE ¶ 80,207 (1996).

(ii) Document No. 3/5

SR has requested that it be given another opportunity to review Document No. 3/5 and to issue another determination regarding that document. We will grant that request.

(iii) The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that SR properly applied Exemption 5 to most of the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless demands disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. In the present case, the requested information consists of the opinions of individuals regarding different aspects of DOE's decisions regarding the privatization of power production from the D-Area Powerhouse and construction of a landfill by the TRA on DOE property. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of employees and managers to make candid statements of opinion. Employees and managers would be less likely to communicate their opinions if they knew or suspected that an agency would release their opinions to the public. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the material protected pursuant to Exemption 5 contained in the requested documents would not be in the public interest.

Document No. 60/1g.2 is a copy of a completed Westinghouse Savannah River Company (WSRC) Make or Buy Decision Form for the production of steel burial boxes which SR withheld in its entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. The document contains financial information supplied by WSRC relating to the decision whether to contract for or make steel burial boxes. In investigating the facts of this case, however, we were informed that this document was found at the WSRC office at the Savannah River Site and that the document was not in the possession of SR. See memorandum of telephone conversation between Pauline Conner, SR, and Richard Cronin, OHA (August 1, 1997). Further, we were informed that the financial information contained in this document was confidential and proprietary. Id. Given these facts, it appears that there is a possibility that this document may not be an agency record for the purposes of the FOIA. If the document is not an agency record, then it is not subject to release pursuant to the FOIA and all arguments pertaining to the applicability of Exemption 5 are moot. Consequently, we will review this document to determine if it is an agency record subject to release under the FOIA.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents that did not originate with the federal government are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80, 127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination of (i) whether the entity that is in possession of the documents is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974); cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, WSRC is responsible for managing and operating the facilities at the DOE's Savannah River Site. While the DOE exercises general control over WSRC's management of those facilities, it does not supervise WSRC's day-to-day operations. We therefore conclude that WSRC is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although WSRC is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, Document No. 60/1g.2 could become an agency record if the DOE obtained the document and it was within the DOE's control at the time that Wilkinson made his FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, we have determined that the DOE never obtained the document at issue, and the document was not in the agency's control at the time of the appellant's request. See memorandum of telephone conversation between Pauline Conner, SR, and Richard Cronin, OHA (August 1, 1997). Based on these facts, Document No. 60/1g.2 clearly does not qualify as an "agency record" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even though Document No. 60/1g.2 is not an agency record, it may still be subject to release if the contract between DOE and WSRC provides that the document in question is the property of the DOE. 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1). We must therefore look to the contract between SR and WSRC to determine the status of this document. That contract states that "[e]xcept as is provided in paragraph b of this clause, all documents acquired or generated by the Contractor in the performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government. . . ." Paragraph (b) sets forth nine categories of records that are the property of WSRC, including "Confidential Contractor financial information. . . ." and "Non-accounting records relating to any procurement action by the Contractor. . . . " Contract No. DE-AC09-96SR18500, Section H.27. Thus, because Document No. 60/1g.2 is a document containing confidential WSRC financial information as well as information relating to a procurement action, it is a WSRC record under the contract and is not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

C. Adequacy of Search

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

As stated earlier, Wilkinson challenged the search that was made for documents in 17 categories listed in Appendix A, stating that he received no response from SR regarding these categories. As an initial matter, we contacted SR to determine if a determination had been made on the categories specified in Wilkinson's Appeal. SR informed us that for any request category that did not have responsive documents listed under it, SR could find no responsive documents. SR noted that the categories of requests were very similar and that several of the documents listed as being responsive for one category were also responsive for other categories although not so noted. See Memorandum from Timothy Fisher, Attorney-Advisor, SR, to Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (July 25, 1997).

As part of our review, we contacted a representative of SR to inquire about the details surrounding her search. The SR official informed us that she had initiated a search of all of the departments at SR that would be likely to possess responsive documents. Each of the following SR Program Offices' files were searched for responsive documents described in each of the 70 categories listed in the request: Manager; Deputy Manager; Assistant Manager for Environmental Restoration and Solid Waste; Assistant Manager for High Level Waste; Assistant Manager of Environment, Safety, Health, and Quality; Assistant Manager for Engineering and Projects; Assistant Manager for Business and Human Resources Utilization; Office of Field Chief Financial Officer; Assistant Manager for Defense Programs; Office of Community Outreach; Office of External Affairs; and Office of Chief Counsel. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Pauline Conner, SR, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (July 25, 1997); Memorandum from Timothy Fisher, Attorney-Advisor, SR to Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (July 25, 1997). The SR official stated the search comprised essentially all of the offices at the SR and that she knew of no other SR office that might possess responsive documents. Given the extent of the search described above, we believe that the search conducted by SR for the categories of requested documents described in Appendix A was adequate.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Charles L. Wilkinson, III, on July 14, 1997, Case No. VFA-0312, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2), and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Savannah River Operations Office for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0313, 26 DOE ¶ 80,218

September 9, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Janice C. Curry

Case Number: VFA-0313

On July 24, 1997, Janice C. Curry filed an Appeal from a determination issued on June 20, 1997, by the Office of Environmental Management (EM) of the Department of Energy (DOE). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Ms. Curry challenges the withholding of information from her, as well as the adequacy of EM's search for documents responsive to her request.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On March 6, 1997, Ms. Curry requested from the DOE any and all documents relating to my employment as a contractor at the Department of Energy. Specifically a letter that was submitted around the week of February 3, 1997, stating that I was a threat to public health and safety. . . .

Also there was a report made on February 14, 1997, that I was beating up an Office Director within [EM]. I do not know if there was a formal written report given to security, but Trina Porter of EM was informed of the incident.

Letter from Janice C. Curry to Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Office, DOE (March 6, 1997). On June 20, 1997, EM issued a determination to Ms. Curry in which it stated that a search of the files of the Office of Intergovernmental and Public Accountability, [EM], was conducted for responsive documents. The search identified one document responsive to your request, a memorandum to Cynthia Brawner-Gaines, in the Office of Minority Affairs, dated February 6, 1997. The document discusses a request to remedy a personnel problem that created an unsafe working environment within the Office of Intergovernmental and Public Accountability (EM-22). Their document, however, is exempt from disclosure pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(6).

Letter from Barry R. Clark, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary for Management and Evaluation, EM, to Janice C. Curry (June 20, 1997). Accordingly, EM withheld this document in its entirety from Ms. Curry. After receiving Ms. Curry's Appeal, we obtained and reviewed a copy of the withheld memorandum.

II. Analysis

A. The Applicability of FOIA Exemption 6 to the Information Withheld by OFO

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

In order to determine whether information may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of HUD, 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749 (1989); Hopkins v. Department of HUD, 929 F.2d 81, 88 (2d Cir. 1991); FLRA v. Department of Treasury Fin. Management Serv., 884 F.2d 1446, 1451 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 864 (1990). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 762-70.

In its determination, EM stated that the disclosure of the memorandum withheld from Ms. Curry "would reveal the identity of its author and subject that individual to unwanted communications and harassment, . . ." Letter from Barry R. Clark, EM, to Janice C. Curry at 1. Ms. Curry counters in her Appeal that she already knows the author of the document. Appeal at 1.

The case before us is much like that of Fine v. Department of Energy, 823 F. Supp. 888 (D.N.M. 1993). In that case, the requester was a former DOE employee who sought documents from the agency, and in particular from the office where he used to work. Id. at 888. The DOE withheld some of the requested documents pursuant to Exemption 6. Id. The court disagreed with the agency's invocation of Exemption 6.

> Defendant [DOE] consistently justifies invoking Exemption 6 by claiming that disclosure of the document in question would subject the author and/or persons mentioned in the document to possible harassment or intimidation by plaintiff. . . .
> Where a person's fear of reprisals from the subject of a communication is "reasonable" based on either demonstrated fact or inferences supported by reasonable claims, privacy interests support the application of Exemption 6. . . .
> Defendant has offered neither facts nor supported inferences tending to show plaintiff might be inclined to harass or intimidate persons. Plaintiff is no longer employed by the defendant so he is not in a position on-the-job to harass or intimidate employees of DOE/OIG and/or its contractors. The Court, therefore, does not find justifiable defendant's repeated invoking of Exemption 6 to prevent harassment or intimidation by plaintiff.

Id. at 895-96. The court also took into account information the requester already knew in determining the degree of privacy invasion that would be caused by the release of the information in the specific documents at issue. Id. at 896.

The facts to be considered in the present case are quite analogous to those the court deemed significant in Fine. Ms. Curry no longer works at the DOE, and she has asserted that she already knows the identities of the authors of the documents she is seeking. Based on our communications with EM regarding the present Appeal, we do not believe these factors were adequately considered in reaching its determination. We therefore will remand this matter to EM for the purpose of issuing a new determination to Ms. Curry. With reference to the relevant factors described above, the new determination shall explain the basis for any conclusion that release of the document would expose its author to unwanted communications and harassment.(1)

B. The Adequacy of EM's Search for Responsive Documents

Ms. Curry also challenges the adequacy of EM's search for documents responsive to her request. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Janice Curry and Steven Goering, OHA (August 20, 1997). We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

In the present case, Ms. Curry specifically requested "any and all documents relating to my employment as a contractor" at the DOE. In light of this broadly worded request, we believe that EM's search for documents should have been more thorough than it apparently was. EM has informed us that it consulted with two EM employees in its search for responsive documents. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Jeffrey J. Williams, EM, and Steven Goering, OHA (August 20, 1997). We subsequently contacted these two persons to ascertain the extent of their contribution to the search for documents. Though we believe that these two employees provided copies of any responsive documents in their possession, we also learned that there may be other locations where documents related to Ms. Curry's employment may be found, including the office responsible for the contract between the DOE and Ms. Curry's former employer. See Electronic mail from Melinda Downing, EM, to Steven Goering, OHA (August 26, 1997). In addition, portions of the document withheld from Ms. Curry refer to other documentation that was provided to EM officials other than those consulted in EM's processing of Ms. Curry's request. We will therefore remand this matter to EM for a further search for documents responsive to Ms. Curry's request. Any responsive documents shall be released to Ms. Curry, or the basis for their withholding explained with specific reference to one or more FOIA exemptions.(2)(3)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Janice C. Curry on July 24, 1997, Case Number VFA-0313, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Office of Environmental Management, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(1) It is possible that information in the memorandum at issue may also be subject to withholding under the deliberative process privilege of FOIA Exemption 5. However, if the information may be withheld under that Exemption, the information should be released unless EM "reasonably foresees that disclosure would be harmful to an interest protected" by the Exemption. Memorandum from Attorney General Janet Reno to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993).

(2) On remand, EM should bear in mind that the FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (1982). See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 89, 91 (1973); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Air Force, 556 F.2d 242, 259-62 (D.C. Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 927 (1978); Casson, Calligaro & Mutryn, 10 DOE ¶ 80,137 at 80,615 (1983). However, segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary where it is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material so that release of the non-exempt material would "compromise" the withheld material, or where the amount of non-exempt material is small and so interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate. Lead Indus. Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

(3) If EM locates any responsive documents that are contained in a "system of records" as defined in the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, EM should process Ms. Curry's request under both the Privacy Act and the FOIA. See 10 C.F.R. Part 1008 (DOE Privacy Act regulations).

August 12, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:W.L. McCullough

Case Number: VFA-0314

On July 22, 1997, W.L. McCullough (Appellant) completed the filing of an Appeal from a determination issued on July 8, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR). This determination was issued in response to a request for information submitted by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In this Decision and Order, we will determine whether the DOE must conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA request.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I BACKGROUND

On June 24, 1997, the Appellant submitted a FOIA request to DOE/OR seeking copies of records regarding a particular grant issued by DOE to the Community Reuse Organization of East Tennessee (CROET). The Appellant specifically requested the total dollars spent in the grant; the names, addresses and telephone numbers of the 101 persons who obtained jobs through the grant (according to the Appellant); and the names and addresses of the nine businesses started through the grant (according to the Appellant). On July 8, 1997, DOE/OR issued its determination, releasing one document showing the total dollars spent in the grant and stating that it could locate no other responsive documents. On July 22, 1997, the Appellant completed the filing of the present Appeal in which he contends that DOE's search for documents was inadequate.

II ANALYSIS

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

We contacted DOE/OR to determine how it conducted the search. We learned that the DOE/OR searched the contracts and procurement office and the office of the assets manager. The contracts and procurement office is the office that supervises the type of grant with which the Appellant is concerned. However, that office has no documentation with the type of detail that the Appellant requested. The office of the assets manager was able to supply the one document the Appellant received, showing that, in sum, 101 new jobs and nine new businesses were created. But it did not contain the detail desired by the requester. DOE/OR believes that detailed information of the type sought by the individual is in the possession of the grantee, CROET.

We then inquired whether documents in the possession of CROET might be subject to release. If responsive documents exist and are in the possession of CROET, they may be subject to voluntary release if the grant between the DOE and the grantee (the contractor) provides that the document in question is the property of the DOE. DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

We therefore next examined the provisions of the grant between DOE and CROET to determine the status of the requested records. That grant does not provide for the ownership by DOE of any grantee-owned or grantee-generated documents. Grant DE-FG05-94OR22364, Clause 27, Public Access to Information. Thus, if the requested documents exist and are in the possession of CROET, these records are not subject to release under the DOE regulations. In sum, we find that DOE/OR searched all of its offices where it had an expectation of finding responsive documents. Any possibly responsive documents which might exist at CROET are not subject to release.(1) Because we find that DOE/OR conducted a reasonable search, we will deny the Appeal.

(1) The Appeal filed by W.L. McCullough on July 22, 1997, Case No. VFA-0314, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)*/ Under 10 C.F.R. § 600.153(e), DOE has a right of access to the type of documents requested here. However, the right to access alone does not give DOE the ability to release such documents under the FOIA or 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3. See The Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,___, Case No. VFA-0307 (July 29, 1997).

We further note that the DOE does not exercise day-to-day control over CROET sufficient to render it an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA. See Telephone Memorandum between Dawn Goldstein, Staff

Attorney, OHA, and Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, DOE/OR (August 7, 1997); Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980); United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807, 815 (1976).

Case No. VFA-0315, 26 DOE ¶ 80,213

August 18, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: William H. Payne

Case Number: VFA-0315

On July 21, 1997, William H. Payne filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him by the Director of the Department of Energy's Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts Division (hereinafter referred to as "the Director"). This determination was issued on June 23, 1997 in response to a request for amendment of records that Mr. Payne submitted under the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to amend a document pertaining to Mr. Payne that he claims is located in a system of records that is covered by the Privacy Act.

The Privacy Act permits individuals to gain access to their records or to information pertaining to them that is contained in systems of records maintained by the agencies. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(1). The Act further provides that individuals may request amendment of records pertaining to them. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(2). Under the Privacy Act, agencies may refuse to amend such records, but must provide a reason for their refusal. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(2)(B)(ii). The DOE regulations implementing the Privacy Act set forth the criteria for reviewing requests for amendment. 10 C.F.R. § 1008.10.(1)

I. Background

Mr. Payne was an employee of Sandia Corporation (Sandia), which operates Sandia National Laboratories as a DOE contractor. In his Privacy Act request, Mr. Payne seeks to amend the minutes of a Sandia Disciplinary Review Committee (SDRC) Meeting that occurred on July 16, 1992. These minutes contain allegations of improper behavior by Mr. Payne. In general, Mr. Payne contends that the allegations of misconduct are false, or that the circumstances surrounding his acts are different than those set forth in the minutes.

In a response issued on June 23, 1997, the Director denied Mr. Payne's request for amendment. The Director stated that, pursuant to the contract between Sandia and the DOE, the minutes are the property of Sandia, and are not maintained in a system of records that is subject to the Privacy Act.

II. Analysis

The Privacy Act generally applies only to certain systems of records maintained by federal agencies. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(a)(1). However, when an agency provides by contract for the operation of a system of records to accomplish an agency function, that agency must follow the provisions of the Privacy Act with respect to that system. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(m).

Article B-XXVI of Sandia's contract with the DOE requires Sandia to comply with the Privacy Act in the design and operation of any identified system of records on individuals when that system of records is involved in the performance of a DOE function. Section H-15 requires Sandia to design and operate a number of systems of records to accomplish a list of agency functions pursuant to the Privacy Act contract clause. Among these systems of records are: DOE-5, Personnel Records of Former Contractor Employees; DOE-47, Security Investigations; and DOE-48, Security Education and/or Infraction Reports.

In her determination, the Director stated that the document that Mr. Payne seeks to amend is not maintained in a system of records pursuant to the Privacy Act, and is the property of Sandia according to the provisions of Sandia's contract with the DOE. However, we have been informed that Sandia's Privacy Act systems of records using Mr. Payne's identifier were not searched to locate a copy of the SDRC minutes, and that the Director's statement that the minutes are not part of a Privacy Act system of records was based only on her general conclusion that document is the property of Sandia pursuant to Section H-18(b) of Sandia's contract with the DOE. See memorandum of August 12, 1997 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Chris Morris, FOIA/Privacy Acts Division.

We find that the Director has misinterpreted Section H-18(b). That provision states, in pertinent part, that:

The following records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of the contract (to the extent not listed and maintained as a Privacy Act record pursuant to the Section H provision entitled ? Privacy Act System of Records') are the property of the Contractor. . . . (4) Employee relations records and files such as records and files pertaining to . . . (ii) Allegations, investigations, resolution of employee misconduct. . . .

Sandia contract, Section H-18(b) (emphasis added). The SDRC minutes are clearly a record relating to the resolution of alleged employee misconduct. However, as the italicized language confirms, this listing of contractor records that are not subject to federal control is explicitly made subject to the provisions of Section H-15, which, as we previously stated, requires Sandia to maintain certain identified systems of records that are covered by the Privacy Act. Therefore, if the SDRC minutes are part of a Privacy Act system of records, they are subject to the provisions of that Act, including those pertaining to the amendment of documents.

In view of these circumstances, we will remand this matter to the Director so that a thorough search of Sandia's Privacy Act systems of records may be performed. If the SDRC minutes are located in a Privacy Act system of records utilizing Mr. Payne's personal identifiers, the Director or her designee should evaluate the request for amendment pursuant to the provisions of 10 C.F.R. Part 1008.10. A revised determination indicating the results of the search and including any evaluation of the request for amendment should be issued to Mr. Payne within 30 days of the date of this Decision.

(1) The Appeal filed by William H. Payne on July 21, 1997 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Director of the FOIA/Privacy Act Division for further proceedings in accordance with directions set forth in this Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy.

(1)Those criteria are (i) the sufficiency of the evidence submitted by the individual, (ii) the factual accuracy of the information, (iii) the relevance and necessity of the information in relation to the purpose for which it was collected, (iv) if such information is used in making any determination about the individual, whether the information is as accurate, relevant, timely, and complete as is reasonably necessary to assure fairness to the individual in such determination, (v) the degree of possibility that denial of the request could unfairly result in a determination adverse to the individual, (vi) the nature of the record sought to be corrected or amended, and (vii) the propriety and feasibility of complying with the specific means of amendment requested by the individual.

Case No. VFA-0316, 26 DOE ¶ 80,212

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Los Alamos Study Group

Case Number: VFA-0316

On July 21, 1997, the Los Alamos Study Group (LASG) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on June 16, 1997, by the Freedom of Information Officer of the Office of Public Affairs of the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (FOIA Officer). The FOIA Officer issued that determination in response to a request for information submitted by the LASG under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office to release the requested information.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the type of information that an agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and that it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

Background

On May 6, 1997, the LASG filed a request under the FOIA in which it sought copies of "a list or lists of all Los Alamos National Laboratory's contractors, consultants, associates, fellows - all individuals and companies other than regular University of California [UC] employees who received funds for services or goods provided - for the calendar year 1996 and the amount paid to them in FY 1996." The FOIA Officer issued a determination on June 16, 1997 stating that the records requested are procurement records in the possession and control of UC. Thus, the FOIA Officer determined that the requested records are not agency records subject to the provisions of the FOIA. In its Appeal, the LASG requests that the OHA direct the FOIA Officer to release the requested information. Specifically, the LASG makes the following three arguments to support its contention that the FOIA Officer must release the requested information:

1. The requested documents are "agency records" since the DOE obtained the records from the Los Alamos National Laboratory, exercised control and possession over the documents, and used the documents in the conduct of its official duties.
2. The University of California contract provides for government ownership of procurement records.
3. The Los Alamos National Laboratory is an "Agency" within the meaning of the FOIA.

Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether the requested records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf., 5 U.S.C. § 552(f) (describing the scope of the term "agency" under the FOIA). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and that they are also not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as UC, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80, 127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at ¶ 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, UC is the contractor responsible for maintaining and operating the Los Alamos National Laboratory. While the DOE obtained UC's services and exercises general control over the contract work, it does not supervise UC's day-to-day operations. See Contract No. W-7405-ENG-36. We therefore conclude that UC is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although UC is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, its records relevant to the LASG request could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time the LASG made its FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, we have determined that no responsive documents were in the agency's control at the time of the appellant's request.(1) Based on these facts, the requested procurement documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

We therefore next look to the contract between DOE and UC to determine the status of the requested records. That contract generally states,

Except for those records owned by the University pursuant to paragraph (b) below, all records acquired or generated by the University's employees at the Laboratory or at the University's Laboratory Administrative Management Oversight Unit in the performance of this contract, shall be the property of the Government . . . .

Contract No. W-7405-ENG-36. Paragraph (b)(8) (modified September 23, 1994) states that the excluded category of Contractor's records includes "[a]ll records related to any procurement action by the Laboratory. . . ." Thus, because records pertaining to procurement actions by the Laboratory are not among the records that are property of the Government under the DOE's contract with UC, these records are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the records sought by the appellant are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA nor subject to release under the DOE regulations. Accordingly, we must deny the LASG Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Los Alamos Study Group on July 21, 1997, Case Number VFA- 0316, is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0317, 26 DOE ¶ 80,220

September 12, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Ralph C. Elkins

Date of Filing: August 15, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0317

On August 15, 1997, Ralph C. Elkins completed the filing of an Appeal from a determination issued to him on June 27, 1997, by the Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division (FOIA Division) of the Department of Energy. That determination concerned a request for information Elkins filed pursuant to the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be required to conduct a further search for the requested information.

The Privacy Act requires that each federal agency permit individuals access to records pertaining them that are contained in a system of records maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information is retrieved by the name or the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.2(m).

In his request, Elkins sought documents pertaining to a security clearance he held between 1962 and 1979. According to Elkins, he was employed by a contractor involved with nuclear powered U.S. Naval vessels. In its determination, the FOIA Division stated that a search for responsive documents was conducted, and that no responsive records were found. The appellant asks that a new search for documents responsive to his request be conducted.

We have stated on numerous occasions that Freedom of Information and Privacy Act requests deserve thorough and conscientious searches for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand cases where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted the person who conducted the search to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed and the basis for the conclusion that no relevant documents exist. He stated that DOE maintains a listing of everyone who is known to have held a security clearance under DOE or any of its predecessor agencies on microfiche and in a computerized database, the Central Personnel Clearance Index. He also stated that both the microfiche and the database were searched, and Elkins' name was not found. He further noted that most inactive security clearance files are discarded after 10 years. Consequently, even if Elkins had been identified as having held a DOE clearance, his actual clearance file would probably not have been available. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between V. Hawkins, Office of Security Affairs, and B. MacPherson, Office of Hearings and Appeals (September 5, 1997). See also Gretchen Lee Coles, 26 DOE ¶ 80,151 (1997) (inactive security clearance files discarded after 10 years). We also contacted the Office of Naval Reactors, which confirmed that it did not have any responsive documents. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between J. Kiell, Office of Naval Reactors, and B. MacPherson, Office of Hearings and Appeals (September 8, 1997).

We are convinced that the FOIA Division followed procedures which were reasonably calculated to uncover the material sought by Elkins. See Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). That the search did not uncover the records that Elkins believed may be in the possession of DOE does not mean that it was inadequate. The FOIA Division searched the indexes that would locate the Elkins security file if it existed within DOE. This search found no indication that Elkins had ever held a DOE security clearance.(1) Consequently, we find that the search for responsive documents was adequate and that no documents responsive to Elkins' request exist at DOE. Accordingly, the Appeal must be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Ralph C. Elkins on August 15, 1997, is hereby denied.

(1)Elkins has not cited any evidence that he had held a DOE clearance. In fact, in his Appeal he states that he understood that the program he was cleared for was within the Defense Department's purview. If that were the case, the Defense Department and not DOE would be most likely to have the documents requested. Mr. Elkins explained in a telephone conversation that he requested the documents from the Defense Department, but they found none and suggested that he try DOE.

August 6, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Egan & Associates

Date of Filing: July 21,1997

Case Number: VFA-0318

On July 21, 1997, Egan & Associates (the Firm) filed an Appeal from a partial determination issued on July 9, 1997, by the Director of the FOIA/Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat (Headquarters FOIA Office) of the Department of Energy (DOE). This partial determination was issued in response to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to (1) release or explain the reason for withholding an attachment to a document, and (2) release all other documents responsive to the Firm's FOIA request.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. BACKGROUND

In a FOIA request dated February 24, 1997, the Firm sought documents submitted to or sent by any DOE Headquarters office concerning Envirocare of Utah, Inc., or Waste Control Specialists LLC (WCS) of Pasadena, Texas. In a letter dated March 14, 1997, the Firm narrowed the scope of the FOIA request by designating the offices that DOE should search for responsive records.

On July 9, 1997, the Director of the Headquarters FOIA Office issued a partial response to the Appellant's FOIA request. In this partial response, the Director indicated that a data system that tracks the correspondence of three different offices had been searched, and that ten documents responsive to the FOIA request had been identified. She further indicated that, except for an attachment to Document No. 8, these documents were being provided to the Firm without deletion. No reason was provided for withholding the attachment to Document No. 8. The Director also stated that other documents responsive to the FOIA request were being reviewed for a "releasability determination," and other offices were still searching for additional documents. Finally, the Director said that the Firm would be contacted when the search and review were complete.

On July 21, 1997, the Firm appealed this partial determination on two grounds. First, it argues that DOE should release all documents responsive to its FOIA request immediately because DOE had failed to process the request within the time required by law, and has still not issued a complete response.(1) Second, the Firm alleges that the Headquarters FOIA Office improperly failed to explain its reason for withholding the attachment to Document No. 8.(2)

In reviewing this Appeal, we contacted Joan Ogbazghi, FOIA Officer, Headquarters FOIA Office, to learn the reason that the attachment to Document No. 8 had not been released. Ms. Ogbazghi stated that this attachment was being reviewed for a "releasability determination." Ms. Ogbazghi further stated that a determination will issue that either releases the attachment or provides a reason for withholding it. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Joan Ogbazghi, FOIA/Privacy Act Specialist, and Linda Lazarus, OHA Staff Attorney (July 24, 1997).

II. ANALYSIS

As this Appeal is based on DOE's alleged failure to process a FOIA within the time specified by law, and an Authorizing Official has not made a final determination concerning the records at issue, OHA does not have the jurisdiction to decide the matters raised by the Firm. Accordingly, we will dismiss the Appeal.

The Firm's arguments are based on DOE's failure to issue a complete and timely response to its FOIA request. In its first argument, the Firm has clearly requested relief because DOE had not complied with the time requirements for processing a FOIA request, and had still not issued a complete determination. The Firm's second argument, concerning DOE's failure to provide a reason for withholding the attachment to Document No. 8, is also rooted in the fact that DOE has not issued a final determination. As detailed above, the Headquarters FOIA Office did not release this attachment or provide a reason for withholding it because a "releasability" determination had not yet been made. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Joan Ogbazghi, FOIA/Privacy Act Specialist, and Linda Lazarus, OHA Staff Attorney (July 24, 1997).

Section 1004.8(a) of the DOE regulations grants OHA jurisdiction to consider FOIA appeals only in the following circumstances:

When the Authorizing Officer has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request . . . or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees.

Section 1004.8(a) has been construed to confer jurisdiction on OHA only when an Authorizing Official has issued a determination that (1) denies a request for records, (2) states there are no records responsive to the FOIA request, or (3) denies a request for a waiver of fees. Suffolk County, 17 DOE ¶ 80,111 at 80,524 (1988). OHA has consistently held that Section 1004.8(a) does not confer jurisdiction when the requester has not received an initial determination from an Authorizing Official, or when an appeal is based on the agency's failure to process a FOIA within the time specified by law. John H. Hnatio, 13 DOE ¶ 80,119 at 80,566 (1985) (dismissing appeal because no determination issued); Tulsa Tribune, 11 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,741 (1984) (no administrative remedy for agency's non- compliance with a timeliness requirement).(3)

(1) The Appeal filed by Egan & Associates on July 21, 1997, is hereby dismissed.

(1)Ordinarily DOE is required to respond to a FOIA request within ten working days. The DOE may take another ten days to respond if "unusual circumstances" delay processing. Section 1004.5(d)(1), (2).

(2)Both the FOIA and DOE regulations require the agency to provide a reasonably specific justification for withholding documents or portions of documents. Mead Data Central v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); Data Technology Industries, 4 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1979).

(3)Because it did not receive a timely response to its FOIA request, the Firm is considered to have exhausted its administrative remedies. 10 C.F.R. §1004.5(d)(4); 5 U.S.C. §552 (a)(6)(c). Accordingly, under the FOIA, the Firm may seek the release of the requested documents in federal district court. 5 U.S.C. §552 (a)(4)(B). However, the agency's failure to comply with the ten day time limit does not result in a waiver of any FOIA exemptions. See Suffolk County, 17 DOE ¶ 80,111 at 80,524 (1988) ; James E. Davis, 11 DOE ¶ 80,151 at 80,689 (1983).

August 4, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:National Security Archive

Case Number: VFA-0319

The National Security Archive filed an Appeal from a determination that the Department of Defense's Director of Freedom of Information and Security Review (the Director) issued to it on June 6, 1997. In that determination, the Director denied in part a request for information that the National Security Archive filed on August 29, 1996, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. The information deleted from the documents released to the National Security Archive in that determination was withheld after the Department of Energy's Office of Declassification, as well as the Department of Defense (DOD), reviewed the documents to determine whether they contained classified information. This Appeal, if granted, would require the Department of Energy (DOE) to release the information that it withheld in its June 6, 1997 determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On August 29, 1996, William Burr of the National Security Archive submitted a request under the FOIA to the DOD. The Director responded to the request by providing a copy of "MIRV: A Brief History of Minuteman and Multiple Reentry Vehicles," dated February 1976, with information deleted pursuant to a DOE determination that the withheld information warranted protection from disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA. The DOD had found that Exemptions 1 and 3 dictated the withholding of certain portions of the document, but those portions were contained within the portions withheld by the DOE. As a result, the Director stated that the deleted information was withheld because the DOE determined it to be classified pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA.

The present Appeal seeks the disclosure of the withheld portions of the requested documents. In its Appeal, the National Security Archive contends that to the extent the information withheld pertains to the "technical characteristics . . . and numbers of ICBMs, target types, anti-ballistic missiles, intelligence information on Soviet ABMs, and military strategies," it was improperly withheld, because the Atomic Energy Act and Exemption 3 do not protect that type of information.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., National Security Archive, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990).

The Director of Security Affairs (SA) has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of SA reviewed those portions of the requested document for which the DOE had claimed exemptions from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA.

In performing his review the Director of SA determined that the original determination letter was worded imprecisely, and created the impression that all of the information originally redacted from the requested document was Restricted Data or Formerly Restricted Data and was withheld, by the DOE, under Exemption 3 of the FOIA. To correct this impression, the Director has now clearly distinguished such information, marked on the document now being released as "DOE b(3)," from other information which is being withheld by the DOD under Exemption 1 (marked as "DOD b(1)") or Exemption 3 (marked as "DOD b(3)"). The Director has affirmed that all of the information being withheld by the DOE is related to nuclear weapons design. He concludes that this information is Restricted Data as defined under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and it is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3. Although the Director has not declassified any information in his review of this matter, more precise redaction reduces the extent of the previously deleted portions, and permits releasing the maximum amount of information consistent with national security considerations.

The Director has also informed us that the material identified and redacted as "DOD b(1)" information is related to military plans, weapons systems, or operations. As such, it is defined as National Security Information under Executive Order 12958, and the DOD therefore determined that it is exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 1 of the FOIA, which exempts from mandatory disclosure matters that are classified under criteria established by an Executive Order. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1). The material identified and redacted as "DOD b(3)" information is related to the military utilization of nuclear weapons. The DOD has determined this information to be Formerly Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3. The denying official for the information redacted by the DOD is Fred S. Celec, Deputy Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Nuclear Matters), Office of the Secretary of Defense.

Based on the review performed by the Director of SA, we have determined that the Atomic Energy Act requires the continued withholding of much of those portions of the document that the DOE previously identified as containing classified information. Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information, nevertheless such consideration is not permitted where, as in the application of Exemption 3, the disclosure is prohibited by statute. Therefore, those portions of the documents that the Director of SA has now determined to be properly classified must be withheld from disclosure. However, because some previously deleted information may now be released as a result of the Director of SA's review, a newly redacted version of the requested document will be provided to the National Security Archive under separate cover. Accordingly, the National Security Archive's Appeal will be granted in part and denied in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the National Security Archive on June 24, 1997, Case No. VFA-0319, is hereby granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) A newly redacted version of the document entitled "A Brief History of Minuteman and Multiple Reentry Vehicles," dated February 1976, in which additional information is released, will be provided to the National Security Archive.

August 18, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Curry Contracting Co., Inc.

Date of Filing: July 30, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0321

On July 30, 1997, Curry Contracting Co., Inc. (Curry) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on June 30, 1997 by the Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned a request for information submitted by Curry pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, OR would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

In a March 3, 1997 FOIA Request to OR, Curry, a contractor at the Office of Scientific and Technical Information (OSTI) facility at OR, asked for copies of the following documents:

(1) All OSHA Reports filed "against" the DOE at the OSTI Building in the last three years;

(2) All documents used or "not used" to determine or "not determine" award fees/incentive fees for Curry;

(3) All complaints pertaining to Curry at the OSTI Building for the last two years;

(4) All reports regarding Curry originating from certain named individuals or from any other person having written documentation regarding Curry; and

(5) All award fee/incentive fee contracts at the OSTI Building over the past three years to the present date, including award fee/incentive fee criteria on time and material contracts and cost plus basis.

See Letter from Curry Contracting Co. to Nancy McGinty, OR (March 3, 1997). In its determination letter dated June 30, 1997, OR provided Curry with documents pursuant to request category nos. 2 and 3. With regard to request category nos. 1, 4 and 5, OR stated that it could not find any responsive documents.

In its July 30, 1997 Appeal, Curry asserts that OR must have documents responsive to request category nos. 1, 4 and 5 and that they should be easily accessible to OR. Consequently, Curry maintains that the search for these three request categories was inadequate.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted OR to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed for responsive documents. OR informed us that with regard to Curry's request for OSHA Reports (request category no. 1), OR and the OSTI facility have not been subject to inspections by OSHA and that DOE itself has the responsibility for enforcement of its own safety and health regulations. Thus, because OR officials knew that OR's offices did not receive such OSHA Reports, a search was not conducted. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, OR, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (August 6, 1997). OR did conduct a search for reports concerning Curry (request category no. 4) at the offices at OSTI as well as the only OR office that might possess relevant documents, the OR contract administration office. (1) Id. Additionally, the files in the offices of each of the individuals listed by Curry in its request were searched for responsive documents. Id. No responsive documents were discovered in any of these searches. Id. As for Curry's request for copies of all award fee/incentive fee contracts at the OSTI Building (request category no. 5), OR informed us that there are no award fee/incentive fee contracts at the OSTI Building other than the contract with Curry and that Curry has a copy of that contract. Id.

Given the facts reported above, we find that OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to find responsive documents. As for request category nos. 1 and 5, the requests for OSHA Reports and incentive fee/award fee contracts, OR had definitive factual knowledge that such documents do not exist (other than Curry's own OSTI contract). With regard to request category no. 4, the request for reports concerning Curry, OR made an appropriate search of offices of all relevant individuals. Because we believe that OR conducted an adequate search for responsive documents, we must deny Curry's appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on July 30, 1997 by Curry Contracting Co., Inc., Case No. VFA-0321, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)OR informed us that while OSTI is operated by DOE Headquarters, any responsive documents that might exist regarding Curry's appeal would be located at OSTI and/or OR since OR handles all contract administration functions for OSTI. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (August 6, 1997).

August 28, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Burlin McKinney

Case Number: VFA-0322

On August 1, 1997, Burlin McKinney filed an Appeal from a determination issued on July 23, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempted from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

Mr. McKinney is an employee of Lockheed Martin Energy Systems, Inc., (LMES) at the DOE's Y-12 plant in Oak Ridge, Tennessee. In 1996, in response to a request from Mr. McKinney, LMES conducted a search and made an inventory of documents located in Building 9201-5E of the Y-12 plant that relate to beryllium. See Memorandum from J.L. Jenkins, Jr. to B.G. Ashdown (June 3, 1996). Mr. McKinney subsequently submitted a FOIA request to DOE/OR for all of the documents appearing on the inventory (with the exception of six boxes). In DOE/OR's July 23, 1997 determination, it stated,

A determination has been made that to process your request at this time would be a burdensome effort on the part of the Department of Energy and the contractor. Prior to copying the responsive records, a review would have to be conducted to identify any classified documents and/or material protected by the Privacy Act. We cannot justify the high costs and burdensome effort to review the records at this time.

Letter from Amy L. Rothrock, DOE/OR, to Burlin McKinney (July 23, 1997).

II. Analysis

In responding to the present appeal, DOE/OR stated that it is "not ?withholding' documents and invited Mr. McKinney to narrow his search to a more reasonable scope. As yet, he has not offered to narrow the scope of this request." Electronic mail from Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR to Steven Goering, OHA (August 12, 1997). However, the FOIA places no limit on the scope of a request for records. Requests only must "reasonably describe" the records being requested and comply with an agency's procedures for the submission of the request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3)(A), (B). Because Mr. McKinney's request was quite specific in identifying the records he is seeking (by reference to an inventory of those records which LMES has already compiled), we cannot find that he has not reasonably described these records, and we have no reason to conclude that the Appellant's request failed to satisfy the procedural requirements of the DOE regulations.

A determination issued in response to a properly submitted FOIA request is required by the DOE FOIA regulations to include a statement of the reason for denial, containing a reference to the specific exemption under the Freedom of Information Act authorizing the withholding of the record and a brief explanation of how the exemption applies to the record withheld, and a statement of why a discretionary release is not appropriate.

10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b).

Because DOE/OR clearly did not in its determination release the documents reasonably described and requested by Mr. McKinney, we do not agree that DOE/OR has not withheld documents from the Appellant. We conclude, therefore, that DOE/OR's determination that it could not "justify the high costs and burdensome effort to review the records at this time" is inadequate justification for withholding the documents in light of the requirements of the FOIA and the DOE regulations. Cf. Ruotolo v. Department of Justice, 53 F.3d 4, 10 (2d Cir. 1995) (rejecting as inadequate agency's response that requesters "? restructure' their request in order to ?narrow[ ] its scope and hence, its cost.'").

It is true that a search for documents in response to a FOIA request can be unduly burdensome. The FOIA requires that a search for responsive documents be reasonable, not exhaustive. Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord, Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). We see no evidence, however, that an unreasonable search would be required to locate the records requested by Mr. McKinney, as the copy of the inventory produced by LMES indicates that the location of these records has already been determined. See Attachment to memorandum from J.L. Jenkins, Jr. to B.G. Ashdown (June 3, 1996); Yeager v. DEA, 678 F.2d 315, 322, 326 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (holding valid request encompassing over 1,000,000 computerized records: "The linchpin inquiry is whether the agency is able to determine ?precisely what records [are] being requested'" (quoting S. Rep. No. 854, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 12 (1974)).

Accordingly, we will remand this case to DOE/OR, which shall issue a new determination releasing to Mr. McKinney the records he has requested or explaining the basis for withholding information from the Appellant, with specific reference to one or more FOIA exemptions.

For the reasons explained above, the present Appeal will be granted as specified above. In all other respects, the Appeal shall be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Burlin McKinney, Case No. VFA-0322, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

September 2, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Hanford Advisory Board

Date of Filing:August 7, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0323

On August 7, 1997, the Hanford Advisory Board (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a July 25, 1997 determination by the Richland Operations Office (ROO) of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, ROO denied the Appellant's request for information under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, the Appellant asks that we order ROO to release the withheld material.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest and not contrary to other laws. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information, the Appellant sought a portion of the successful proposal that Fluor Daniel Hanford, Inc. (FDH) made in competition for the management and operations contract at the Hanford facility. Specifically, the Appellant sought the portions of the proposal dealing with the amount of money FDH claimed it could save the DOE, as well as the Executive Summary portion of the proposal. In the determination letter, ROO, pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3) (Exemption 3) and Subtitle B, Section 821 of the National Defense Authorization Act of 1997 (NDAA), 41 U.S.C. § 253b(m), withheld the proposal. ROO stated that Section 821 of the NDAA bars release of any portion of the proposal. Under the NDAA, a proposal may not be made available to any person under the FOIA when the proposal has not been set forth or incorporated by reference in the contract. ROO stated that since the FDH proposal has not been set forth or incorporated by reference in the contract between DOE and FDH, it must withhold the requested information.

In its appeal, the Appellant makes three arguments. First, it argues that the NDAA should not be applied retroactively to a proposal and resulting contract, each of which was issued prior to the NDAA's effective date. Second, it argues that the ROO determination letter was not signed by a FOIA Officer. Third, it argues that because the amount of projected savings and other facts were already released to the public by DOE, the agency has waived its right to withhold the requested information.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA, cited by ROO, allows agencies to withhold information if the withholding is specifically authorized by another federal statute. However, the withholding statute must meet strict statutory guidelines. An agency properly invokes Exemption 3 only where the withholding statute "(A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matters to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). This Office has found the NDAA to be an Exemption 3 statute, because it meets the subpart (A) requirement of that exemption. Chemical Weapons Working Group Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,170 at 80,730 (1997); see also Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,163 (1997) (Fried, Frank).(1)

We first examined whether ROO applied the NDAA correctly. Under the NDAA, proposals must be withheld, except if a proposal has been set forth or incorporated by reference into a contract. In that case, the proposal must be released. Under Fried, Frank, this exception also includes the case in which portions of the proposal (as opposed to the entire proposal) are set forth or incorporated by reference into the contract. Id. at 80,709. Upon review of the FDH/DOE contract, we find that no relevant portions of the proposal fall within this exception. We further note that the ROO determination letter was properly signed by a Denying Official, in accordance with the regulations governing determination letters denying requests for records. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(2).

Next, we find that it was proper for ROO to apply the NDAA to a document created prior to the effective date of the Act. The text of the statute does not in any way limit its authority to documents created after the Act's effective date of September 23, 1996. Congress clearly has the power to change the scope of the FOIA at any time, and to do so with respect to all federal agency records in existence at the time. Further, as a policy matter, it would be logistically quite complicated to apply the Act to some proposals and not others.

Nevertheless, we find merit in the Appellant's argument that the DOE has waived its right to withhold the requested information by releasing certain information about the FDH proposal. In various newspaper articles the Appellant submitted, the Appellant has demonstrated that the DOE stated publicly at press conferences and press releases surrounding the awarding of the contract that, inter alia, FDH has pledged to save approximately $200 million each year for the next five years and that FDH will not receive any fee should it fail to meet certain objectives.

In our view, FOIA principles such as waiver extend to material covered by Exemption 3 and the NDAA. The D.C. Circuit has extended waiver principles in Exemption 3 cases involving other statutes. E.g., Fitzgibbon v. Central Intelligence Agency, 911 F.2d 755 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Fitzgibbon) (waiver principle applied but 50 U.S.C. § 403(d)(3) found to protect foreign intelligence information since publicly disclosed information pertained to later time period). Thus, we see no reason not to apply the waiver principle in the NDAA context.(2)

The extent to which the DOE has waived FOIA exemptions depends on the circumstances of the disclosure. Carson v. United States Department of Justice, 631 F.2d 1008, 1016 n.30 (D.C. Cir. 1980); Marlene Flor, 26 DOE ¶ 80,104 (1996). Under Fitzgibbon, the prior released information must meet three criteria to be considered to have waived Exemption 3 applicability: (1) the information requested must be as specific as the information previously released; (2) the information must match the information previously disclosed; and (3) and the information requested must already have been made public through an official and documented disclosure. 911 F.2d at 765 (citing Afshar v. Department of State, 702 F.2d 1125, 1133 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (Afshar)). In this case, we find that the publicly released statements by the DOE meet the Afshar criteria and are sufficient to waive the applicability of Exemption 3. Since even "off-the-record" disclosures to the press have been found to create a waiver, Lawyers Comm. for Human Rights v. INS, 721 F. Supp. 552, 569 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), a major national announcement by the DOE must do the same. However, the waiver of information in the proposal only extends to the precise facts that the DOE released publicly and that are duplicative of facts contained in the proposal. Therefore, we are remanding this case to ROO to determine which precise facts the DOE released are contained in the proposal and responsive to the Appellant's request. ROO should then release these portions, unless they are subject to an exemption,(3) in which case ROO should provide adequate justification for withholding any portion of them.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Hanford Advisory Board on August 7, 1997, Case No. VFA-0323, is granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Richland Operations Office, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)1/ The NDAA provision likely also meets the requirements of subpart (B) of Exemption 3 since it refers to a particular type of matter to be withheld, i.e., proposals.

(2)We note however that we are not deciding whether waiver principles apply to information covered by other statutes, such as information classified as Restricted Data pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, or information covered by the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905.

(3)ROO should consider whether Exemption 4 or the Trade Secrets Act applies to any material for which it determines waiver has occurred.

September 8, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Bruce Darrow Gaither

Date of Filing: August 7, 1997

Bruce Darrow Gaither files this appeal from a determination letter issued by the Director of the Department of Energy's (the Department) Freedom of Information Act and Privacy Act Division (the Director). The determination letter replied to Gaither's request for information submitted to the Department under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA).(1) In the determination letter, the Director said that no documents responsive to Gaither's request had been found. Gaither's appeal, if granted, would require the Department to conduct a further search for responsive documents.

Background

Pursuant to the FOIA, Gaither had requested "documents, photographs, and reports relating to operational space-borne laser systems to be used as antiballistic defense systems wherein the laser beams heat incoming enemy missiles." In his appeal, Gaither asserts that the records he requested do exist. Gaither has not provided a basis for this assertion.

The FOIA generally requires federal agencies to release agency records to the public upon request. If a requester has reasonably described the information he is seeking and has complied with the DOE's FOIA regulations, 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, the Department must conduct a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents.

Adequacy of the Department's Search

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). The standard requires that the search be reasonable, however, not exhaustive. "The issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist, but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

The Office of Hearings and Appeals will remand a case where a search was inadequate. E.g., Petrucelly & Nadler, P.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,187 (1996); Dennis McQuade, 25 DOE ¶ 80,158 (1996). To evaluate the adequacy of the search, we telephoned staff members of the Department's offices for Defense Programs and Energy Research, who had been tasked with the original search. An official at the Office of Defense Programs informed us that employees of the office searched for material responsive to the request and found no records. An official of the Office of Energy Research told us that a search had been made for any materials relating to lasers and found two projects concerning x-ray laser microscopes. Neither project, however, was responsive to Gaither's request for information about space-borne laser missile defense systems.

In addition, the official from Defense Programs suggested that we contact the Department's Office of Nuclear Energy, Science, and Technology (Nuclear Energy), which had not previously been tasked with the request. We contacted the Office of Nuclear Energy, and an official from that office subsequently informed us that its files had been search and no records responsive to the request had been found. None of the Department's employees whom we contacted knew of any other office that might contain responsive records.

Conclusion

We believe that the Department has conducted a search that was reasonably calculated to uncover all materials relevant to Gaither's request. Consequently, we find no reason to remand this request for a further search. We will therefore deny Gaither's appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The appeal filed by Bruce Darrow Gaither, Case No. VFA-0324, is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0326, 26 DOE ¶ 80,221

SEPTEMBER 19, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: William H. Payne

Date of Filing: August 21, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0326

On August 21, 1997, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received an Appeal filed by William H. Payne from a determination that the Department of Energy's (DOE) Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque) issued to him. Albuquerque issued this determination in response to a request for information that Mr. Payne submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require Albuquerque to release certain legal invoices to Mr. Payne in unredacted form.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document which is exempted from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public unless the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On October 16, 1996, Mr. Payne submitted a FOIA request for: (I) invoices submitted by private law firms to Sandia National Laboratories (Sandia), a DOE contractor, for the defense of a sexual harassment lawsuit involving Sandia employees, (ii) investigative reports concerning the plaintiff's allegations of sexual harassment in the Sandia litigation, and (iii) records indicating whether a former DOE official had been accused of sexual harassment or was the subject of a "security clearance action."

In its response to Mr. Payne's request, Albuquerque provided the names of two law firms that Sandia had retained to defend the harassment litigation and provided the dollar amounts paid to these firms. The actual invoices were withheld in their entirety under Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Albuquerque further stated that any investigative reports concerning the harassment allegations made in the litigation were the property of Sandia and were not agency records. Finally, based on Exemptions 6 and 7© of the FOIA, Albuquerque refused to confirm or deny the existence of records that would indicate whether a former DOE official had been accused of sexual harassment or had been the subject of a "security clearance action."

Mr. Payne appealed Albuquerque's determination to this Office on January 22, 1997. In his submission, Mr. Payne argued that the legal invoices are not subject to Exemption 5 because they are not internal governmental records. He also contested Albuquerque's findings with regard to investigative reports concerning the alleged harassment and records pertaining to whether the former DOE official had been accused of sexual harassment or had been the subject of a "security clearance action."

In a Decision and Order issued on February 20, 1997, William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,161 (1997), the OHA rejected Mr. Payne's contentions and upheld Albuquerque's determination except for that Office's finding that the legal invoices are exempt from mandatory disclosure in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. We found that although the invoices consist largely of information that is privileged under the attorney work product component of Exemption 5 and therefore shielded from mandatory disclosure, such as the descriptions of the legal services provided, the monthly and daily totals of hours billed by each attorney and the dates on which their services were provided, they also contain non-privileged information, such as the attorneys' identities, their hourly rates, the total fees charged for the litigation, and the costs of expenses such as photocopying, reporting services and mileage, that cannot be withheld under Exemption 5. Accordingly, we remanded this matter to Albuquerque with instructions to segregate non-exempt material from the invoices and release that material to Mr. Payne.

In response to our Decision, Albuquerque issued a new determination to Mr. Payne on July 18, 1997. In this determination, Albuquerque released portions of the invoices indicating the names of the law firms retained by Sandia, the dates of the invoices, the dates that they were received by Sandia, the name of the person whose suit the firms were defending, and the names of the individual attorneys of record in the case. However, citing Exemption 4 of the FOIA, Albuquerque withheld the name of an attorney who worked on the case but whose participation is not a matter of public record, the attorneys' hourly rates and the costs of expenses such as photocopying, reporting services and mileage. Exemption 4 protects from mandatory disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person [that is] privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). In support of its determination, Albuquerque stated that release of the information would likely cause financial harm to the legal firms involved by revealing their pricing strategy and the attorneys' thought processes and theories in defending cases of this nature. That Office also stated that information of this type is generally closely guarded by the firms, and that disclosure would impair the competitive position and ability of the legal firms to provide low- cost, quality legal services to government contractors.

On August 21, 1997, Mr. Payne filed the current Appeal. In this submission, he again argues that Exemption 5 does not apply to the invoices because they are not inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums. Mr. Payne also contests the Albuquerque Office's application of Exemption 4 in this case.

II. Analysis

A. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 protects from mandatory disclosure "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party ... in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). In the February 20, 1997 Decision issued to Mr. Payne, we addressed and rejected his contention that Exemption 5 does not apply to the invoices. We stated that when documents have been created outside of an agency but pursuant to agency initiative, courts have held that such documents are intra-agency documents. See Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1078 n.44 (D.C. Cir. 1971). See also Joyce E. Economus, 23 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1994); Tri-City Herald, 18 DOE ¶ 80,115 (1989); Rio Grande Sun, 15 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1987) (Exemption 5 applies to invoices prepared by law firm representing DOE contractor). Mr. Payne has not presented any arguments that convince us that our previous holding in this regard is incorrect. We therefore conclude that Albuquerque properly applied Exemption 5 in withholding portions of the invoices.

B. Exemption 4

Exemption 4 permits an agency to withhold from public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, a document supplied to the DOE on a non-voluntary basis must meet the following criteria: the document must contain either (A) "trade secrets" or (B) information which is (1) "commercial or financial," (2) "obtained from a person," and (3) "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Association v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). Cf. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (information voluntarily provided to the Government is confidential under Exemption 4 if it is the kind of information that the provider would not customarily make available to the public).

We have previously stated that a determination by the DOE that information is exempt from disclosure pursuant to Exemption 4 must include a reasonably specific explanation of how the withheld material meets the foregoing tests. Davis, Wright & Jones, 19 DOE ¶ 80,104 (1989) (Davis); Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1984). Such an explanation should indicate the type of competitive injury which would result from disclosure or the manner in which the information, if disclosed, could be utilized by a competitor to damage the firm's market position. Davis.

Applying these criteria to the determination under review, we do not believe that Albuquerque has adequately explained its reasons for withholding the attorney's name, the hourly rates, and the copying, reporting service and mileage expenses under Exemption 4. Although the determination generally concludes that release of this information would impair the firms' competitive positions, Albuquerque has not indicated what competitive harm would result from the release of each of these three categories of information, or how this information might be used by the law firms' competitors. For example, it is unclear from Albuquerque's determination how release of the expense information would compromise the firms' competitive positions, or how release of the attorney's name might be used by the firms' competitors.

We will therefore remand this matter to Albuquerque. On remand, Albuquerque should, if necessary, confer with the law firms and then issue a new determination in which it either releases the attorney's name, the hourly rates and the expense information to Mr. Payne, or describes the specific competitive harms that will result from the release of each of these categories of information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by William H. Payne on August 21, 1997 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Albuquerque Operations Office for further proceedings in accordance with the directions set forth in this Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:The National Security Archive

Dates of Filing: August 25, 1997

December 23, 1997

VFA-0365

The National Security Archive filed appeals from determinations issued to it on July 1 and October 14, 1997, by the Deputy Director for Communications and Information of the Headquarters Air Combat Command, Department of the Air Force (Air Force). In those determinations, the Air Force denied in part a request for information that the National Security Archive filed pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. The Air Force specified that certain information deleted from the documents released to the National Security Archive in each determination was withheld after a review of the documents had been performed by the Office of Declassification of the Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs. This appeal, if granted, would require the Department of Energy (DOE) to release information that it withheld through the Air Force's July 1 and October 14, 1997 determinations.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release to the public, upon request, documents in their possession and control. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On June 22, 1994, the National Security Archive submitted a request to the Air Force for a number of documents, all of which pertained to annual or short-term histories of specified elements of the United States Air Force. Because three of these documents contained DOE information, the Air Force referred the three documents to the DOE's Office of Declassification (OD) for a determination concerning their possible release. OD responded by returning the documents to the Air Force after marking the information to be withheld and providing an explanation of each withholding. The Air Force released to the National Security Archive portions of the deleted versions of the requested materials in interim determinations it issued on July 1 and October 14, 1997.

Although the DOE withheld a number of passages from the materials the Air Force released in its July 1, 1997 determination letter, the National Security Archive has appealed only the DOE's withholding of the information deleted on page 120 of Volume I of Historical Study Number 117, History of Strategic Air Command, FY 1970 (Case No. VFA-0327). Similarly, although the DOE withheld a number of passages from the materials the Air Force released in its October 14, 1997 determination letter, the National Security Archive has appealed only the DOE's withholding of the information deleted on page 112 of Volume I of Historical Study Number 116, History of Strategic Air Command, FY 1969 (Case No. VFA-0365). In its determination letters, the Air Force explained that the information withheld from these two pages could not be released under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 and therefore was withheld under Exemption 3 of the FOIA. The information withheld from these pages reveals, for fiscal years 1969 and 1970, the number of nuclear weapons, by weapon type and weapon yield, that were required for support of Strategic Air Command alert forces.

The present appeals seek the disclosure of these withheld portions from the reports that the Air Force provided to the National Security Archive. In its appeals, the National Security Archive states that the Government has declassified related information concerning earlier years, and contends that comparable data for the years at issue could now be declassified and released to the public "without damaging U.S. interests in nuclear non-proliferation or otherwise violating statutory requirements."

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 27 DOE ¶ 80,115 (1998); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1992). According to the Office of Declassification, the portions of the two pages that the DOE deleted under Exemption 3 were withheld on the grounds that they contain information that has been classified as Formerly Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure.

The Director of the Office of Security Affairs (SA) has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of SA reviewed those portions of the two pages at issue for which the DOE had claimed an exemption from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA.

The Director of SA considered the concerns the National Security Archive specifically raised in his appeal, and performed as well a general review of the material under the current classification guidance. Based on the review that the Director of SA performed, the DOE has determined that the Atomic Energy Act requires the continued withholding of the information withheld in the initial determinations. In accordance with current joint Department of Defense/DOE classification guidance, the withheld information, which reveals nuclear weapon quantity by weapon type and yield, is classified as Formerly Restricted Data. Section 142 of the Atomic Energy Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2162, prohibits the disclosure of such information. Consequently, this information was and is properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 3 of the FOIA.

A finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information. Nevertheless, such consideration is not permitted where, as in the application of Exemption 3, the disclosure is prohibited by statute. Therefore, those portions of the two pages at issue that the Director of SA has determined to be properly classified must continue to be withheld from disclosure. Accordingly, the National Security Archive's appeals will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The appeals that the National Security Archive filed on August 25 and December 23, 1997, Case Nos. VFA-0327 and VFA-0365, are hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:William H. Payne

Date of Filing: September 2, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0329

On August 14, 1997, William H. Payne made a request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, and at the same time, sought a fee waiver for this request from the Freedom of Information Officer of the Office of Public Affairs of the DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office (FOIA Officer). On September 2, 1997, Mr. Payne filed a FOIA Appeal requesting that the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the DOE grant a fee waiver for his August 14, 1997 FOIA request and respond to his allegation that the FOIA Officer violated federal law when she did not issue a determination concerning his FOIA request within ten days.

In an August 15, 1997 letter titled "RECEIPT OF FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT REQUEST," the FOIA Officer informed Mr. Payne that "[i]f the estimated cost of fulfilling your FOIA request exceeds what you are allowed [without charge], we will correspond with you again addressing your request for a fee waiver." The FOIA Officer informed us that she did not consider this letter to be a denial of Mr. Payne's fee waiver request. See September 3, 1997 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, and Elva Ann Barfield, FOIA Officer, Albuquerque Operations Office. Since the FOIA Officer acknowledged that she did not make a determination regarding Mr. Payne's fee waiver request nor has she completed her search for documents, Mr. Payne's fee waiver appeal is not ripe for our review. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a). Thus, we must dismiss the fee waiver portion of this appeal. However, we encourage the FOIA Officer to issue a determination concerning Mr. Payne's fee waiver request as quickly as possible.

Mr. Payne also asks us to describe "the steps . . . [OHA is] taking to bring . . . [the FOIA Officer] to justice for violating federal law." Under the FOIA, OHA has jurisdiction to review agency determinations related to information access. The unspecified relief that Mr. Payne seeks against the FOIA Officer is not part of OHA's jurisdiction. When a FOIA Officer fails to respond to a FOIA request within ten days, we can only request that the FOIA Officer act on this matter expeditiously. If Mr. Payne chooses, he has the right under the regulations to seek judicial review on this issue in federal district court. See Association of Public Agency Customers, 26 DOE ¶ 80,103 (1996).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by William H. Payne on September 2, 1997, Case Number VFA-0329, is hereby dismissed.

sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0330, 26 DOE ¶ 80,223

September 29, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Wilburn T. Dunlap

Date of Filing: September 2, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0330

On September 2, 1997, Wilburn T. Dunlap (Dunlap) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) from a determination that DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office (DOE/AL) issued to him on August 8, 1997. That determination concerned a request for information that Dunlap submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, DOE/AL would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

Dunlap was employed by the War Department, U.S. Engineers at McDonald Ranch in New Mexico during 1944 and 1945. In his request, Dunlap argued that the employees of the U.S. Engineers should be recognized for their part in this country's history, and requested a "complete list of the U.S. Engineer's force stationed at McDonald Ranch, test site of the first atomic bomb, in 1944 and 1945." Letter from Dunlap to Bradbury Science Museum, Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) (May 29, 1997).

Upon receipt of the request, LANL searched their files and located a listing of personnel of the U.S. Engineers Office for the year 1945, but found no responsive material for 1944. LANL sent the responsive material to DOE/AL. However, the personnel list was considered a Department of Defense (DOD) document, and DOE/AL forwarded the document to DOD to determine its releasability and respond directly to Dunlap.(1) DOE/AL advised Dunlap of this result in a final determination letter. Letter from FOI Officer, DOE/AL, to Wilburn Dunlap (August 8, 1997). On September 2, 1997, Dunlap filed the present Appeal, challenging the adequacy of LANL's search.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted DOE/AL to ascertain the scope of the search it performed for the responsive documents. In response to the original request, LANL searched all of its files and found the 1945 U.S. Engineers Office personnel listing. After the Appeal was filed, DOE/AL requested another search. LANL searched all of its files again, but was still unable to find the 1944 listing or any other responsive material. Because the first search successfully located the 1945 listing, it was reasonable to expect that the 1944 listing, if still in existence, would be found in the same database. The FOIA does not require an exhaustive search, only a reasonable one. On the basis of the facts provided above, we find that LANL conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents. Accordingly, we must deny Dunlap's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on September 2, 1997 by Wilburn T. Dunlap, Case No. VFA-0330, is hereby denied.

October 1, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Richard R. McNulty

Date of Filing: September 2, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0331

On September 2, 1997, Richard R. McNulty (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued to him on July 28, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Richland Operations Office (Richland). In that determination, Richland released two documents responsive to a request for information the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Richland deleted and withheld portions of the documents under FOIA Exemptions 5 and 6, however. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

I. BACKGROUND

In response to an extensive request filed by the Appellant, Richland has issued a number of determinations. The present Appeal concerns only the determination letter issued to the Appellant on July 28, 1997. That determination letter released two documents to the individual, herein referred to as "Attachments A and B." Extensive portions of both documents were redacted and withheld under Exemptions 5 and 6. (1) See Determination Letter at 1. On September 2, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, challenging Richland's withholdings.

II. ANALYSIS

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by federal agencies be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Only Exemptions 5 and 6 are at issue in the present case.

A. Attachment A

Attachment A consists of notes taken at a DOE meeting held on April 1, 1997. The names of most of the individuals that participated in the meeting appear in the top portion of this document, while the remainder of the document summarizes the comments made by the meeting's participants in apparent chronological order. Richland released this document but redacted the portions of the document that indicated who made each statement under Exemption 6. Richland also withheld other portions of the document which did not indicate identities under Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege.

Exemption 6

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under Exemption 6 an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld under Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

Richland has found a privacy interest in information revealing the identities of individuals contained in Attachment A. Determination Letter at 1. The identities of the individuals were withheld because of a concern that their release might subject the individuals to harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions. In such circumstances, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests. See Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991); KTVY- TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985). Accordingly, we have followed the courts' lead. James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,129 (1990). The potential for harassment, intimidation or other personal intrusions is obvious from the context of Attachment A since it contains numerous derogatory (and possibly inflammatory) statements concerning the Appellant. Accordingly, we find a significant privacy interest exists in the present case.

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 109 S. Ct. at 1481-84. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 1483. Consequently, the Court held, only that information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990). Release of the individuals' identities linked with particular statements would not likely contribute to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government. Accordingly, we find that there is little or no public interest in their release.

Because release of the individuals' identities in that context could reasonably be expected to subject them to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for the individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non- existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing their identities could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Accordingly, we find that their identities were properly withheld under Exemption 6.

Our review of the unredacted copy of Attachment A reveals that Richland withheld a great deal of information other than that which could link individuals to particular statements at the meeting. That information was withheld under Exemption 5. Exemption 5 exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege, and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980). In the present case, only the "deliberative process privilege" is at issue.

The deliberative privilege covers only the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87-91 (1973). Moreover, the FOIA, as implemented by 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(c), requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). The only exceptions to the requirement of segregation are where exempt and non-exempt material are so "inextricably intertwined" that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the exempt material, Lead Industries Assoc., Inc. v. Occupational Safety and Health Admin., 610 F.2d 70, 85 (2d Cir. 1979), or where non-exempt material is so small and interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate it. Id.

Our review indicates that Richland has withheld more information than necessary under the rules which govern this area. In our view, release of the vast majority of the information withheld under Exemption 5 in these documents would pose no tangible risk to interests protected under the FOIA. Specifically, we find that by redacting identities of individuals who either made comments at the meeting or whose names were mentioned at the meeting the privacy of the speakers as well as the deliberative process may be preserved while allowing the individual access to the substance of the conversation.

Accordingly, we find that Richland must review all of its withholdings under Exemption 5 to ensure that they are appropriate under the "reasonably foreseeable harm" standard set forth by the Attorney General in 1993. This standard applies a presumption in favor of disclosure which, in the absence of a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by an exemption, should result in a determination by the agency that the public interest lies with disclosure. See J. Reno, Memorandum for Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993). Therefore we are remanding this portion of the Appeal to Richland. On remand, Richland should conduct a further review, under this standard, of all information withheld pursuant to Exemption 5.

B. Attachment B

The Determination Letter indicates that only the names of individuals were withheld from Attachment B, pursuant to Exemption 6. Our initial review of the redacted version of Attachment B indicated that a good deal more than the names of individuals had been deleted. In fact, virtually all of the text of this document had been deleted. Accordingly, we contacted Richland to obtain an unredacted copy of that document in order to facilitate our review. We were then informed by Richland's FOIA Officer that, despite its requests, the FOIA office was never provided with an unredacted copy of Attachment B. Instead, we were informed that the document was in the possession of the DOE employee who had created it, Jackson Kinzer, Richland's Assistant Manager for Tank Waste Remediation. We contacted Mr. Kinzer in order to obtain an unredacted copy of Attachment B. However, we were informed by Mr. Kinzer that he had taken the document to his residence and had been unable to locate it.

Without this document we are unable to conduct a meaningful review of Richland's withholdings from this document. Therefore we are also remanding this portion of the Appeal to Richland. On remand, Richland shall immediately conduct an exhaustive search for a complete copy of Attachment B. Promptly upon locating Attachment B, Richland should either release it to the Appellant in its entirety or conduct a further review of the document in accordance with the guidance set forth above before issuing a new determination letter.

III. CONCLUSION

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about DOE actions, we are also mindful of the need to preserve the privacy rights of individuals. By releasing Attachment A with only those redactions necessary to prevent linking of specific individuals with specific statements, the agency can provide as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights.

For the reasons set forth above, we are remanding this matter to the Department of Energy's Richland Operations Office for completion of the expanded search for Attachment B, an additional review of Attachment A, and the issuance of a new determination letter.

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Richard R. McNulty on September 2, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0331) is hereby granted to the extent set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Richland Operations Office for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

Case No. VFA-0332, 26 DOE ¶ 80,226

October 14, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Dr. Daniel D. Eggers

Date of Filing:September 16, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0332

On September 16, 1997, Dr. Daniel D. Eggers (Appellant) completed the filing of an Appeal from a determination issued on April 14, 1997, by the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR).(1) This determination was issued in response to a request for information that the Appellant submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In this Decision and Order, we will determine whether the DOE must conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA request.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I BACKGROUND

On March 20, 1997, the Appellant submitted a FOIA request to DOE/OR seeking copies of records regarding a particular World War II-era patent which the Appellant believes belonged to his father, an employee at the Oak Ridge site in that era. The Appellant specified an "S-number," S-5443, connected with this patent and explained that the patent related to the electromagnetic separation process. He also stated that a person named S.W. Scott worked with his father on the patent. On April 14, 1997, DOE/OR issued its determination, stating that it could not locate any responsive documents. On September 16, 1997, the Appellant completed the filing of the present Appeal in which he contends that DOE's search for documents was inadequate.

II ANALYSIS

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

We contacted DOE/OR to determine how it conducted the search. DOE/OR informed us that it searched the patent and intellectual property records databases of both the Office of Chief Counsel (OCC) of DOE/OR, as well as the Office of General Patent Counsel of DOE/OR's management and operating contractor of the Y-12 plant, Lockheed Martin Energy Systems (LMES).(2) We learned that the OCC database contains records of the World War II era, but the Y-12 database only contains records originating in 1984 or later. See Records of Telephone Conversations between Dawn Goldstein and Amy Rothrock (September 16 and 18, 1997).

Subsequent to issuing its determination, DOE/OR found an entry listed for "Eggers" in patent logbooks kept by OCC in the DOE/OR offices and dating back to the 1940's. (3)According to this entry, the patent was applied for on May 25, 1949 and abandoned on August 3, 1951, meaning that there was never a final patent issued. Using this new information, DOE/OR requested that the DOE Headquarters Office of General Counsel (OGC) conduct a search of its patent database and other patent records, and that LMES conduct a further search of its Y-12 records. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Amy Rothrock (September 18, 1997). According to Betty Winchester of OGC, the patent referred to in the logbook had an S-number of S-5443, therefore confirming that this patent is the same patent referred to in the Appellant's request. However, OGC's paper file on this matter would have been destroyed due to its age. See Electronic Mail Message from Amy Rothrock to Dawn Goldstein (September 26, 1997) (including electronic mail message from Betty Winchester to DOE/OR). Also, no further documents could be located at the Y-12 plant. See Electronic Mail Message from Amy Rothrock to Dawn Goldstein (September 25, 1997).

Ms. Rothrock explained the difficulty of finding patent and other research records created prior to 1984. These records are dispersed over approximately 300 buildings at Y-12 and apparently are not indexed in any way. In addition, the subject matter of the patent, the electromagnetic separation process, is extremely broad. DOE/OR stated that if the Appellant could inform DOE/OR of a more specific title of his father's project or references to any papers his father had written, or the name of his father's office, DOE/OR might be able to find responsive records. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Amy Rothrock (September 18, 1997).

We find that the search as previously conducted was adequate. Without more specific information, a search through thousands of unindexed files for records that might not exist due to their great age would have imposed an unreasonable burden on DOE/OR. See Nation Magazine v. U.S., 71 F.3d 885, 892 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (to search 23 years of unindexed files would impose an unreasonable burden on an agency); Lois Blanche Vaughn, 26 DOE ¶ 80,165 at 80,713 (1997). However, the Appellant has now informed us that he is able to provide specific information to DOE/OR which may prove helpful to them in conducting a further search. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Appellant (October 1, 1997). If the Appellant had not provided such information, we would have upheld DOE/OR's determination. However, since this Office has helped to uncover this additional information, we are able to promote a quick, responsive resolution by remanding this case to DOE/OR for an additional search for responsive documents. On remand, DOE/OR shall identify all documents responsive to the Appellant's reformulated request and either release them or provide adequate justification for withholding any portion of them.(4)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Dr. Daniel D. Eggers on September 16, 1997, Case No. VFA-0332, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office, which shall conduct a search for documents responsive to the Appellant's reformulated request as described in the above Decision and Order, and shall promptly issue a new determination regarding those documents.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The Appellant initially filed a submission with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) on September 3, 1997. The OHA held the submission in abeyance until September 16, 1997, when we received a copy of the April 14, 1997 determination. The Appellant informed us that he did not receive the determination letter until August 30, 1997. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA, and Appellant (October 1, 1997). Therefore, we will consider the Appeal as being filed within the regulatory deadline of thirty calendar days after receipt of the determination letter. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a).

(2)According to DOE/OR's records, the Appellant's father worked only at the Y-12 plant. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, DOE/OR (October 1, 1997).

(3)DOE/OR sent a copy of that logbook entry to the Appellant. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Amy Rothrock (September 18, 1997).

(4)In addition, we suggest that the Appellant submit a FOIA request to the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (located within the Department of Commerce) for information regarding this patent.

October 7, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Dennis Kirson

Date of Filing: September 10, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0333

On September 10, 1997, Dennis Kirson (Kirson) filed an Appeal from a final determination the Albuquerque Operations Office (AL) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him on September 3, 1997. In that determination, AL denied a request for information that Kirson filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

I. Background

In his request for information, Kirson sought a copy of the "list of impacted positions at AL which was required to be delivered to Field Management (FM) on August 15, 1997." (1) In its September 3, 1997 determination letter (Determination Letter), AL identified one document responsive to Kirson's request. AL stated that this document was a copy of a preliminary assessment of federal staff employee positions to be eliminated which was forwarded to the DOE's Offices of Human Resources and Field Management on August 20, 1997. AL withheld the document in its entirety pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA. The Determination Letter further stated that because AL has not reached any decision and was still negotiating with the DOE Office of Defense Programs (DP) regarding the positions to be eliminated (in the event of limits imposed by Congressional funding), the document was an intra-agency predecisional document protected by Exemption 5. The Determination Letter also concluded that release of the document would not be in the public interest.

In his Appeal, Kirson argues that Department of Energy Headquarters elements such as DP and the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Environment, Safety and Health have already released lists of targeted positions to be abolished. Additionally, Kirson asserts that the DOE Operations Offices in Nevada and Idaho have also released their targeted position lists. Consequently, Kirson argues that because other DOE offices have released their targeted positions lists, AL may not now withhold its list pursuant to Exemption 5. Kirson also asserts that Office of Personnel Management (OPM) regulations seek to establish uniform and fair employment practices for all federal employees in all federal agencies. He apparently argues that AL's action in withholding the document contravenes the spirit of these regulations.

II. Analysis

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The document at issue contains a list of positions at AL which AL officials proposed for elimination pursuant to a scheduled reduction in force beginning on September 5, 1997 if Congressional funding were enacted. This document was submitted to HR so that it could review the positions which were proposed to be eliminated at AL. AL's Office of Chief Counsel has informed us that no final decision has been made regarding which, if any, positions should be eliminated and that AL and DP are still considering the issue. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ron O'Dowd, Office of Chief Counsel, AL, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (September 16, 1997). Additionally, an official at HR has informed us that given the fact that no RIF was conducted on September 5, 1997, new lists of targeted positions would probably have to be created if Congress were now to enact funding reductions for DOE. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Pam Jeckell, Assistant Director of Workforce Reinvention and Staffing and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (September 22, 1997). Given the facts presented to us, we find that the document is a pre- decisional, intra-agency document. Consequently, we have determined that Exemption 5 was properly applied to the document at issue. However, there is a very small amount of segregable factual material, consisting of column headings, which can be released to Kirson.

Kirson's arguments supporting his position that the entire document should be released are not persuasive. We have discovered that the Nevada and Idaho DOE Operations Offices and at least one DOE Headquarters office each discretionarily released to their employees, outside of the FOIA, a list of targeted positions to be eliminated. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Kara Rickey, Office of Public Affairs, Nevada Operations Office and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (September 22, 1997); Memorandum of telephone conversation between Carl Robertson, Idaho Operations Office and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (September 22, 1997); Memorandum of telephone conversation between Ann Broker, Office of General Counsel, DOE Headquarters and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (September 19, 1997). We are unaware of any lists of targeted positions that have been released by the DOE pursuant to the FOIA. See Memorandum of telephone conversation with GayLa Sessoms, Director, Freedom of Information and Privacy Group and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (September 22, 1997). The fact that a DOE office has exercised its discretion to release similar documents outside of the FOIA process is not determinative of whether a particular document may properly be withheld pursuant to the FOIA. Similarly, Kirson's general argument that withholding the document would violate the spirit of the OPM regulations is also irrelevant to the determination of whether a document may properly be withheld pursuant to the FOIA and the DOE regulations which implement it.

III. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that AL properly applied Exemption 5 to most of the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless requires disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. In the present case, the requested information consists of a preliminary opinion by AL officials regarding which positions could be eliminated in the eventuality of reduced funding by Congress. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of DOE Operations Office officials to make candid statements of opinion regarding a very sensitive issue potentially affecting the jobs of DOE employees. Employees and managers would be less likely to communicate their opinions on this and similar issues if they knew or suspected that an agency would release their opinions to the public. Additionally, AL officials have informed us that, in their opinion, release of the preliminary information contained in the list could cause serious confusion among employees at AL since the list is not final. We believe that in some workplace environments release of a preliminary list such as the one in the present case could cause significant employee distress. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the material protected pursuant to Exemption 5 contained in the requested documents would not be in the public interest.(2)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Dennis Kirson on September 10, 1997, Case No. VFA-0333, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2), and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

(1)At the time of Kirson's request, DOE was making provisional plans to reduce its workforce by issuing Reduction-in-Force (RIF) notices on September 5, 1997 to various DOE personnel due to limits imposed by proposed Congressional funding reductions. DOE's Office of Human Resources (HR) and Administration requested lists of the positions proposed to be eliminated at each DOE office and facility.

(2)This determination is not made less valid by the fact that other DOE offices have exercised their discretion to release lists of targeted positions outside of the FOIA context, especially since agencies may decide to disclose information under those circumstances without any assessment of the effect of the disclosure on the public interest.

November 26, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Rural Alliance for Military Accountability

Date of Filing: September 29, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0335

On September 29, 1997, the Rural Alliance for Military Accountability (RAMA) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) on September 3, 1997, by the Albuquerque Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE/AL). In its Appeal, RAMA challenges the adequacy of DOE/AL's response to its FOIA request.

I. Background

On September 22, 1996, RAMA requested from the DOE

a copy of all documents pertaining to the transportation routes DOE and/or their contractors are utilizing to transport materials/wastes from DOE's Rocky Flats facility in Colorado to Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico[, i]ncluding but not limited to maps, Records of Decision, NEPA documentation, risk analysis documentation, accident procedures, emergency preparedness training materials and all written policies pertaining to the transportation of materials/wastes.

Letter from Grace Bukowski, RAMA, to DOE (September 22, 1996). This request was referred to the DOE's Rocky Flats Field Office and DOE/AL, who were asked to respond directly to RAMA. On September 3, 1997, DOE/AL issued a determination in which it listed each location under its jurisdiction in which a search for responsive documents was conducted. In five of the locations searched, DOE/AL located no documents responsive to RAMA's request. Responsive documents were located in four locations. All of these documents were released to RAMA in their entirety, with the exception of two classified documents that were sent to the DOE's Office of Declassification for further review.

RAMA appeals what it characterizes as a "totally inadequate response" from DOE/AL "on the grounds that the partial response does not address the FOIA request, is unresponsive, and contradictory in the information provided. The fact that the Los Alamos National Laboratory, the destination and recipient of nuclear materials, did not provide requested information reflects the unresponsiveness of the partial response." Appeal at 1.

II. Analysis

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To ascertain the extent of the search conducted for documents responsive to RAMA's request, we contacted DOE/AL. The DOE/AL FOIA Office (FOIA Office) identified nine offices under its jurisdiction that it believed might have documents responsive to the request, and therefore had forwarded a copy of the request to each office for a search and identification of relevant documents. Our inquiry in response to the present Appeal revealed the following.

A. Offices That Located Responsive Documents

The DOE/AL's Operations Management Division (OMD) informed the FOIA Office that it would not be involved in the transport of material/wastes to which the request referred unless an accident occured. See Electronic mail from Geneva Stevenson, OMD, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 18, 1997). Therefore, OMD did not conduct a formal search of its files. However, the office did locate a document entitled "Radiological Assistance Program Transportation Emergency Response (RAPTER), Training Course Lesson Plan," which was released to the appellant in its entirety. Id.

The Environmental Protection Division (EPD) of DOE/AL states that in response to the appellant's request, it first searched our NEPA database querying for information about Rocky or Rocky and LANL. From this listing, we made a physical search of the files in the EPD filing system and those in long term storage. These files provide the detail of the more general topic. By individually reading the information in the file, we then discover the associated activities. It was through this method that we ascertained the information that was sent to your office [a memorandum with attachments that was released to the appellant in its entirety]. We also searched through the NEPA EPD library for documents that related to material movement between Rock[y Flats] and LANL. Most of these documents are EAs and EISs with backup environmental study documents. No information was derived from this effort.

Electronic mail from Joseph F. Robbins, EPD, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 19, 1997).

The DOE/AL's Environmental Impact Statement Projects Office (EISPO) stated that "the LANL SWEIS [Site-Wide Environmental Impact Statement] project has been the only one that has specifically been involved with the question of transportation routes for waste/materials from RF to LANL," and that all of the information in EISPO's files on this subject were forwarded to the FOIA Office. Electronic mail from Corey Cruz, EISPO, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 18, 1997). These documents were released to the appellant in their entirety.

The Transportation Safety Division (TSD) of DOE/AL stated that the request was forwarded for searches to the Chief of the Operations Branch and the Chief of the Support Branch of TSD. Electronic mail from Roseann M. Trujillo, TSD, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 20, 1997). A document entitled "Federal Agent Job Analysis" and four documents from TSD's Transportation Safeguards Training Center were released to the appellant in their entirety. Id. In addition, two responsive documents were identified as classified and were therefore forwarded to other DOE offices for further review.(1)

B. Offices That Located No Responsive Documents

DOE/AL's Contracts and Procurement Division (CPD) stated that it searched the contract files it maintains for the contract between the DOE and University of California for the management and operation of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, but found no responsive documents. Electronic mail from Timothy R. Coalson, CPD, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 14, 1997).

The Safeguards and Security Division (SSD) (formerly Security and Nuclear Safeguards Division) of DOE/AL stated that it identified its "Survey of TSD Shipments" as potentially containing responsive documents, but that these files only encompass TSD's review of how couriers follow procedures (e.g., communication, deployment) relating to protection of materials en route, and therefore did not contain responsive documents. Electronic mail from Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office, to Steven Goering, OHA (November 17, 1997).

DOE/AL's Waste Management Division (WMD) stated that it searched its files under the topics "Radioactive waste, Los Alamos National Laboratory, and Transportation. In addition, a search was conducted of the Los Alamos National Laboratory Site Engineer's files and the Waste Management Division Library. No documentation on the above subject was found." Electronic mail from John M. Evett, WMD, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 12, 1997).

The DOE's Los Alamos Area Office (LAOO) referred the appellant's request to its Office of Environment and Projects (OEP) and its Office of Facility Operations (OFO). OEP "searched its NEPA files, ER project files, project management files, and four employees of [OEP] searched their personal files." Electronic mail from Pat Wolford, LAAO, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 19, 1997). OFO "searched its files under the subjects of accident procedures and emergency preparedness." Id. Neither search revealed responsive documents.

The DOE's Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) stated that it "performed an extensive search for [responsive] materials in the following areas: the CIC [Computing, Information, and Communications]-10 CARLA [Computer-Aided Retrieval Los Alamos] Databases; the CIC-14 Reports Collection, and the FSS [Facilities Safeguards and Security]-16 Authors' Database." Letter from Mary Edgett, Information Practices Office, LANL, to Elva Barfield, FOIA Office (January 27, 1997). LANL further stated that it contacted personnel in LANL's Nuclear Materials Technology Division Office, Facilities Safeguards and Security Division, and Environment, Safety, and Health Division. Id. LANL's search revealed no responsive documents. Id.

LANL's January 27, 1997 letter to the FOIA Office referenced a memorandum from its Business Operations Division stating that it has exhausted every possible LANL organization that may have any maps, routing decision papers, risk analysis, NEPA documentation, accident procedures, emergency preparedness training, policies and procedures, etc., without any success. The type of documents requested are usually the responsibility of the originator of the shipments. It is my recommendation that you refer this request to Rocky Flats.

Id.

Based on the information detailed above, we find that the DOE/AL FOIA Office made a conscientious effort to address each element of the appellant's request and conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover the materials sought by the appellant. However, based on information obtained subsequent to the filing of the present Appeal, we will remand this matter to DOE/AL to conduct a further search for responsive documents in two offices under DOE/AL's jurisdiction. First, the DOE/AL's Environmental Impact Statement Projects Office (EISPO) informed the FOIA Office that, in the process of preparing the LANL SWEIS, we are analyzing transportation, including transportation between RF and LANL. However, at that time (and indeed, at this time) these analyses have not been completely peer reviewed and approved as part of the Draft LANL SWEIS; as such, they are considered predecisional. When the Draft LANL SWEIS is published, this information will be publicly accessible.

Electronic mail from Corey Cruz, EISPO, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 18, 1997). On remand, DOE/AL should contact EISPO to determine whether it had any responsive materials, including any notes or drafts, at the time of the appellant's request. Any such material should be identified and released, unless subject to a FOIA exemption. In addition, subsequent to the present Appeal, DOE/AL's Waste Management Division suggested to the FOIA Office that its search include the DOE/AL's Office of Technology and Site Programs (OTSP). Electronic mail from John M. Evett, WMD, to Terry Apodaca, FOIA Office (November 12, 1997). DOE/AL has agreed to contact OTSP to search for responsive documents. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Terry Apodaca, DOE/AL, and Steven Goering, OHA (November 20, 1997).

Therefore, though we recognize that DOE/AL has already gone to great lengths to locate documents responsive to the appellant's request, we will remand this matter for the limited purpose of conducting a further search for responsive documents in these two offices. Any responsive documents shall be released to the appellant, or the basis for their withholding explained with specific reference to one or more FOIA exemptions.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Rural Alliance for Military Accountability on September 29, 1997, Case Number VFA-0335, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order

Case No. VFA-0336, 26 DOE ¶ 80,230

November 3, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: The Oregonian

Date of Filing: September 30, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0336

On September 30, 1997, The Oregonian filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on September 10, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Bonneville Power Administration (BPA). In that determination, BPA denied in part a request for information the Oregonian filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require BPA to release the information the Oregonian requested.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On August 14, 1997, The Oregonian filed a Request for Information with BPA in which it sought the following information:

> ". . . any records showing the amounts and receipts of such fees [paid] to Bonneville from individual utilities; any agreements between Bonneville and individual utilities regarding or establishing exit fees; the amount of load that individual utilities diversified, prompting them to be subject to exit fees; any and all correspondence between Bonneville and individual utilities regarding exit fees; and any and all agreements (sic) that purport to invoke ? confidentiality' agreements between Bonneville and individual utilities regarding diversification and exit fees."

BPA issued a determination on September 10, 1997, in which it identified several responsive documents which included contract amendments containing the amounts of load (the amounts of power BPA is obligated to supply to its customers) diversified by individual BPA customers and the applicable exit fees. However, BPA withheld the amounts of load and the specific exit fees under Exemption 5 of the FOIA because it determined that this information is confidential commercial information and that disclosure would harm BPA's ability to compete for future business. (1) See Determination Letter at 1.

On September 30, 1997, The Oregonian filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) contending: that BPA improperly withheld the requested information from disclosure and that the public has an overriding right to know the terms under which BPA has released public utilities from their financial obligations to the government. See Appeal Letter at 3. The Oregonian asks that the OHA direct BPA to release the responsive documents.

II. Analysis

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149; 95 S. Ct. 1504, 1515 (1975) (Sears). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall within this exemption: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). However, the Supreme Court has recognized that Exemption 5 also incorporates those "privileges which the Government enjoys under the relevant statutory and case law in the pre-trial discovery context." Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184; 95 S. Ct. 1491, 1500 (1975). Accordingly, "[t]he test under Exemption 5 is whether the documents would be ? routinely' or ?normally' disclosed upon a showing of relevance." F.T.C. v. Grolier, 462 U.S. 19, 26; 103 S. Ct. 2209, 2214 (1983) (citing Sears, 421 U.S. at 148-49; 95 S.Ct. at 1515 (1975)). Therefore, if a privilege is well recognized by statute or in the case law, it may properly be invoked under Exemption 5. See United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 465 U.S. 797, 799-801; 104 S. Ct. 1488, 1492-93 (1984).

Among the privileges incorporated by the courts under Exemption 5 is the "confidential commercial information privilege." See, e.g., Federal Open Market Comm. v. Merrill, 443 U.S. 340; 99 S. Ct. 2800 (1979) (Merrill) (holding that since disclosure of Domestic Policy Directives would significantly harm the Government's monetary functions or commercial interests, they could properly be withheld under Exemption 5); Government Land Bank v. General Services Administration, 671 F.2d 663 (1st Cir. 1982) (Land Bank) (withholding a government generated real estate appraisal).

"The Federal courts have long recognized a qualified evidentiary privilege for trade secrets and other confidential commercial information." Merrill, 443 U.S. at 356; 99 S. Ct. at 2810. The courts have applied this privilege in the FOIA context to prevent the Government from being placed at a competitive disadvantage and to facilitate the consummation of contracts. Id., 443 U.S. at 360; 99 S. Ct. at 2812. Exemption 5 therefore "protects the government when it enters the marketplace as an ordinary commercial buyer or seller." Land Bank , 671 F.2d 665 (footnote omitted).

However, the protection afforded by this privilege is limited in scope and lasts only as long as necessary to protect the government's commercial interests. Id. Moreover, the application of this privilege is not automatic. Merrill, 443 U.S. at 362; 99 S. Ct. at 2813. The burden is upon the agency to show that the records it seeks to withhold under the privilege are confidential and that their disclosure might be harmful. American Standard v. Pfizer, Inc., 828 F.2d 734, 746 (Fed. Cir. 1987) (applying the privilege in the civil discovery context). In the civil discovery context, once these burdens are met, the burden shifts to the party seeking disclosure to prove that disclosure should occur by establishing a substantial need for those documents. R&D Business Systems v. Xerox Corp., 152 F.R.D. 195; 196-197 (D. Colo. 1993) (Xerox). In the FOIA context, however, the individual FOIA applicant's need for information is not to be taken into account in determining whether materials are exempt under Exemption 5. See Merrill, 443 U.S. at 362-63; 99 S. Ct. at 2813, and cases cited therein. Accordingly, courts have found that documents which are immune from discovery absent a showing of substantial need are not "routinely" or "normally" available to parties in litigation and therefore are exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 5. F.T.C. v. Grolier, Inc., 462 U.S. 19, 27; 103 S. Ct. 2209, 2214 (1983).

Accordingly, if the agency has shown that it has maintained the confidentiality of the withheld records and that their release might result in harm to the government's commercial interests, the agency could properly withhold records under Exemption 5. In the present case, there is no indication in the record that BPA has not maintained the confidentiality of the documents in question. We therefore turn to the next issue before us: whether release of the amounts of load and the specific exit fees would likely result in harm to BPA's commercial interests or its ability to consummate future contracts.

In the past, we have analyzed whether the disclosure of confidential commercial information would harm BPA's commercial interests. See Ball, Janik and Novack, 25 DOE ¶ 80,197 (1996) (Ball). In Ball, the documents in question involved marketing research such as customer lists. Id. In that case, our office found that release of this information would provide BPA's competitors with otherwise unavailable insight into BPA's potential future marketing strategies. Id. at 80,744. OHA further found that if BPA's customers obtained the marketing information, "it would provide them with undue leverage in future contract negotiations." Id. Likewise, in the present case, we find that BPA has met its burden of showing that the customer information at issue would result in harm to its commercial interests and its ability to consummate future contracts. BPA has indicated that it is "currently competing against other suppliers for short-term sales to the same customers that elected to pay exit fees and reduce their long-term obligation to purchase from BPA." See Memorandum from Timothy A. Johnson, Office of General Counsel, BPA, to Kimberly Jenkins Chapman, Attorney- Examiner, OHA (October 15, 1997). In light of the fact that BPA calculated their customers' exit fees based on market conditions, we agree that the amounts of load and the specific exit fees are commercial information that would provide BPA's competitors with valuable insight into its view of the market and its pricing strategy over the next several years. The release of the withheld information would provide competitors with an unfair advantage to compete for BPA's customers. Accordingly, BPA has established a likelihood that significant competitive harm would result from release of the amounts of load and specific exit fees. We therefore find that this information was properly withheld under Exemption 5.

III. Public Interest Determination

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We find that release of the withheld material would not be in the public interest. In its Appeal, The Oregonian argues, inter alia, that the public has an overriding right to know whether BPA is adequately fulfilling its financial responsibility. Although the public does have a general interest in learning about the manner in which the government operates, we find that interest to be attenuated by the fact that the withheld information consists of confidential commercial information that if released would affect BPA's ability to compete for future business. Any slight benefit that would accrue from the release of the withheld information is far outweighed by the likelihood of harm to BPA's commercial interests. Accordingly, we conclude that release of the withheld information would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the confidential commercial information privilege. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (in order to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeably harm basic institutional interests that underlie Exemption 5.)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by The Oregonian, OHA Case No. VFA-0336, on September 30, 1997, is hereby denied.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)BPA has entered into a number of power contracts with public utilities. However, some of these utilities have found cheaper sources of power on the market. BPA allowed these customers, through provisions in their contracts, to diversify their loads. Thus, diversification occurs when customers purchase some of their power needs from other sources. In turn, customers pay fees (exit fees) to BPA for the right to diversify their loads, that is to buy some of their power elsewhere and to reduce their contractual obligations.

October 30, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Patricia C. McCracken

Date of Filing: October 1, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0337

On October 1, 1997, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received an Appeal filed by Patricia C. McCracken from a determination that the Manager of the Department of Energy's (DOE) Savannah River Operations Office issued to her. The Manager issued this determination in response to a request for information that Ms. McCracken submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the Manager to release certain documents and to conduct a further search for responsive materials.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document which is exempted from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In her FOIA request, Ms. McCracken sought access to a copy of the contract between Westinghouse Savannah River Company (WSRC), the Management and Operations contractor at the DOE's Savannah River facility, and BNFL Savannah River Corporation (BNFL), and any documents concerning BNFL's qualifications or setting forth BNFL's current duties at the site. In his response, the Manager provided Ms. McCracken with a copy of BNFL's contract with WSRC and a copy of WSRC's contract with the DOE.

The Manager also identified as responsive to Ms. McCracken's request a combined proposal that WSRC, BNFL, and two other subcontractors submitted to the DOE in response to a solicitation for proposals. This proposal led to the awarding in 1996 of the current Management and Operations contract to WSRC. The Manager withheld the proposal in its entirety under Exemption 3 of the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). In so doing, he found that release of the proposal would violate Section 821 of the National Defense Authorization Act of 1997, P.L. 104-201 (NDAA).

In her Appeal, Ms. McCracken contends that the Manager improperly applied Exemption 3 in withholding the proposal. She also contests the adequacy of the search for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

A. Exemption 3

Exemption 3 of the FOIA allows agencies to withhold information if specifically authorized by another federal statute. However, the authorizing statute must satisfy one of two criteria. It must either (i) require that the information be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (ii) establish particular criteria for withholding or refer to particular types of information to be withheld. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). The Supreme Court has established a two-prong standard of review for Exemption 3 cases. See CIA v. Sims, 471 U.S. 159, 167 (1985). First, the agency must determine whether the statute in question is a statute of exemption as contemplated by Exemption 3. Id. at 167. Second, the agency must determine whether the withheld material satisfies the criteria of the exemption statute.

We have previously found that the recently enacted NDAA is a statute of exemption for purposes of 5 U.S.C § 552(b)(3). In Chemical Weapons Working Group Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,170 (1997) (Chemical Weapons), we stated that the NDAA is a federal statute that contains language specifically prohibiting agencies from releasing contractor proposals under the FOIA. Id. at 80,730. That statute states, in pertinent part, that "a proposal in the possession or control of an executive agency may not be made available to any person under section 552 of title 5, United States Code." NDAA, § 821(b). We therefore stated in Chemical Weapons that since the NDAA allows agencies no discretion in withholding certain types of information, it satisfies the first criterion of Exemption 3. Ms. McCracken has presented no arguments that convince us that this holding is incorrect. We therefore conclude that the NDAA is a statute of exemption for purposes of the FOIA.

We must next determine if the proposal that was withheld by the Manager is included within the coverage of section 821(b) of the NDAA. By its terms, this provision applies to "any proposal, including a technical, management, or cost proposal, submitted by a contractor in response to the requirements of a solicitation for a competitive proposal." Id. (1) We find that section 821(b) is applicable to the proposal in question, and that the Manager properly withheld that document under Exemption 3. In its solicitation for proposals for the Savannah River Management and Operations contract, the DOE sought submissions from integrated teams of companies that could perform the various functions associated with operating that facility. In response to this solicitation, WSRC, BNFL and two other companies submitted a joint proposal that was reviewed and accepted by the DOE Source Evaluation Board (SEB). (2) Although technically BNFL is a subcontractor to WSRC, BNFL was named as part of the performing entity in the joint proposal. BNFL's qualifications were reviewed by the SEB and were a factor in the SEB's acceptance of the joint proposal. Moreover, BNFL cannot be replaced as a member of the performing entity without the DOE's approval. See memorandum of October 27, 1997 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Tom Reynolds, Director, Department of Contracts, Savannah River Operations Office. Therefore, we conclude that BNFL is a contractor for purposes of section 821(b) of the NDAA, and that the joint proposal was properly withheld under Exemption 3.

B. Adequacy of the Search

In responding to a request for information under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. The fact that the results of a search may not meet with the requester's expectations does not necessarily mean that the search was inadequate. Robert Hale, 25 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,501 (1995). Instead, in evaluating the adequacy of a search, our inquiry generally focuses on the scope of the search that was performed. See, e.g., Richard J. Levernier, 25 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1995).

In order to determine the scope of the search, we contacted the Savannah River Office. We were informed that the request was referred to WSRC, and that the DOE Offices of Contract Management, Environmental Quality, and Materials and Facilities were also searched. See memorandum of October 23, 1997 telephone conversation between Mr. Palmer and Pauline Connor, Savannah River Operations Office. In addition, at Ms. McCracken's request, her inquiry was forwarded to the DOE's Richland, Washington Operations Office for information concerning BNFL's activities at other DOE sites. Based on the information before us, we conclude that the search was reasonably calculated to uncover the materials sought, and was therefore adequate.

C. Conclusion

We have found that the Manager properly withheld the joint proposal under Exemption 3, and that the search for responsive documents was adequate. We will therefore deny Ms. McCracken's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Patricia C. McCracken on October 1, 1997 is hereby denied.

(1)1/ Section 821(b) does not, however, "apply to any proposal that is set forth or incorporated by reference in a contract entered into between the agency and the contractor that submitted the proposal." Id. We have examined the contract between BNFL and WSRC, and we find that the joint proposal is not set forth or incorporated by reference in that contract. Moreover, we have been informed by the Savannah River Operations Office that the proposal is not set forth or incorporated by reference in the contract between WSRC and the DOE. See memorandum of October 27, 1997 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Tom Reynolds, Director, Department of Contracts, Savannah River Operations Office.

October 31, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Natural Resources Defense Council

Date of Filing:October 2, 1997

Case Number:VFA-0338

On October 2, 1997, the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) filed an Appeal from a September 4, 1997 determination by the Freedom of Information Officer (FOI Officer) of the Albuquerque Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the FOI Officer partially granted a request for information the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, the NRDC asks that we order a search for additional responsive documents.

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE shall release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest and not contrary to other laws. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information, the NRDC sought copies of documents containing information on the number of nuclear warheads disassembled since 1945. In a June 27, 1997 "partial response" letter, the FOI Officer enclosed responsive documents and informed the NRDC that the Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) was in the process of searching for more responsive documents. In her September 4, 1997 determination letter, the FOI Officer informed the NRDC that LANL completed its search and found no additional responsive material.

In its Appeal, the NRDC argues that the Albuquerque Operations Office provided it with data for nuclear warhead dismantlements at the Pantex plant, but provided no data for any other DOE facilities involved in dismantlements, including Los Alamos, Sandia, Burlington, Medina, Clarksville, and Y-12 at Oak Ridge. The NRDC states "[i]t would be extraordinary if DOE did not maintain records of the dismantlements of some 27,000 nuclear warheads that are believed to have been dismantled prior to 1975, at plants other than Pantex."

II. Analysis

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted several DOE employees and a representative of the FOI Officer to ascertain the validity of the NRDC's contention that there must exist additional responsive information. As a result of these discussions, several facts came to light. First, the FOI official at the Oak Ridge Operations Office informed us that several facilities, including Oak Ridge, Savannah River, the Mound facility, and Kansas City, were involved in the dismantlement of various weapon components, but not the actual nuclear warheads. From our discussions, it appears that the DOE disassembled the warheads at Pantex.

Second, it appears that other records may exist at Sandia which, if reviewed cumulatively, could lead to the summary totals the NRDC seeks. These other records, if they exist, may be in the form of annual summaries of assemblies and dismantlements of individual weapons. We will require the Albuquerque Operations Office to search for these records and, if they exist, determine if they are responsive.

Finally, there is a chance that responsive archived records may exist. The representative of the FOI Officer informed us that the Albuquerque Operations Office is continuing to search for records that the DOE may have archived. Since the Albuquerque Operations Office search is ongoing, we will require the Albuquerque Operations Office to complete this search and issue a new determination to the NRDC to confirm whether or not responsive material exists in the archives.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Natural Resources Defense Council on October 2, 1997 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Freedom of Information Officer of the Office of Public Affairs of the Albuquerque Operations Office for further action in accordance with the directions set forth in this Decision.

On October 2 and 10, 1997, the Appellant, F.A.C.T.S. (For A Clean Tonawanda Site), filed Appeals from final determinations issued by the Office of the Executive Secretariat (ES) and the Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) of the Department of Energy (DOE) on September 2 and September 9, 1997 respectively.(1) In their determinations, ES and OR partially granted a request for information that the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Additionally, OR denied the Appellant's request for a fee waiver.

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information dated February 4, 1997 (Request), the Appellant sought records relating to five categories of information pertaining to the DOE's Formerly Utilized Sites Remedial Action Program (FUSRAP) and a FUSRAP site in Tonawanda, New York.(2) In this Request, the Appellant additionally requested a waiver of fees based upon a favorable ruling on a prior request by a James Rauch. The Request was initially sent to OR, which processed the Request regarding one of the categories of requested information (Category 1). OR also forwarded the Request to ES so that it could issue a determination regarding the remaining four categories of requested information (Categories 2, 3, 4 and 5). In an interim determination dated April 2, 1997, ES provided the Appellant with documents responsive to three of the categories of requested information (Categories 3, 4 and 5). Subsequently, ES issued a final determination letter dated September 2, 1997 (ES Determination Letter), in which it identified documents responsive to Category 2 of the Appellant's request, namely, documents pertaining to "[t]he legal basis, both in general terms and in terms specific to the Tonawanda, NY FUSRAP Site, of the policy outlined in the second paragraph of the March 8, 1995 memorandum, James W. Wagoner II to L. Price, OR, Subject: Ownership of 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material."

The documents responsive to Category 2 of the request were identified as an informal note from an official at the DOE's Former Sites Restoration Division to DOE Headquarters' Office of Chief Counsel and "the responding legal advice." ES Determination Letter at 1. ES withheld all of these documents pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA. In the ES Determination Letter, ES asserted the documents were subject to the attorney-client privilege since the note concerned a request to the Office of Chief Counsel regarding the DOE's interpretation of the March 8, 1995 memorandum referenced in the Appellant's Category 2 request. Thus, ES asserted that each document was protected from disclosure by Exemption 5.

OR also sent a letter dated February 6, 1997 to the attorney who was then representing the Appellant, Robert J. Rauch. In that letter, OR rejected the Appellant's request for a fee waiver. The February 6 letter stated that while James Rauch had been granted a fee waiver for material relating to the Tonawanda site in 1995, the current request had been made by a different requester and the materials requested were "broader in scope" than the material requested in 1995. Consequently, OR classified the requester as "commercial" and asked that the Appellant either affirm that he would pay costs associated with the processing or submit additional justification supporting his request for a fee waiver. The Appellant did not submit any additional information.

On September 9, 1997, OR issued a final determination regarding documents responsive to Category 1 of the Request (OR Determination Letter). Category 1 of the Request asked for documents relating to:

> "[a] meeting requested by Niagara Landfill, Inc. and its affiliate, Browning-Ferris Gas Services, Inc., in a letter dated June 7, 1995, from Ralph L. Halpern, attorney, Jaeckle, Fleischmann & Mugel, to Lestor [sic] K. Price, Director, Technical Services Division, U.S. Department of Energy (DOE), Oak Ridge Operations (ORO), Subject: "Re: Radioactive Contamination at Seaway Landfill in Tonawanda, New York. . . ."

Request at 1-2. In the OR Determination Letter, OR released seven documents in their entirety to the Appellant. OR also provided the Appellant with an index of 38 documents which were responsive to Category 1 of the Request but were being withheld in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA. (3) OR asserted that the documents contained material which would be protected by the deliberative process, attorney-client and attorney-work product privileges. OR further asserted that DOE decision-making processes would be seriously harmed by the release of these documents. Additionally, the OR charged the Appellant $428.39 to process the Request.

II. The Appeals

In its Appeal of ES's determination (Case No. VFA-0339), the Appellant challenges the application of Exemption 5 to the documents identified in the ES Determination Letter. The Appellant argues that DOE should, in its discretion, release the documents notwithstanding their being subject to the attorney-client privilege given the significant public interest in the subject matter of the documents. In support of this argument, the Appellant claims that the Tonawanda Site is contaminated with 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material and that ownership of this material is relevant to who is responsible for the release of such material into the environment.(4) Consequently, release of information concerning the legal basis of the DOE's position regarding ownership of 11(e) Byproduct Material is necessary for informed public opinion in the environmental review process for the Tonawanda Site. Thus, according to the Appellant, release of the information in the documents would serve the public interest.

The Appellant also argues that the Category 1 documents withheld by the OR Determination Letter pursuant to Exemption 5 should also be released. The Appellant asserts that the index does not lists the originators and addressees of the withheld OR documents. Consequently, in light of the vague descriptions given in the index, some of the documents may not be intra- or inter-agency documents protected by the deliberative process privilege. Additionally, the Appellant requests that we order OR to provide it with an index which clearly indicates originators and addressees of the documents listed in the index. The Appellant further argues that, notwithstanding the possible applicability of Exemption 5, each of the documents should be discretionarily released. The Appellant asserts that these documents would reveal if any agreements were reached regarding indemnification of Niagara Landfill, Inc. (NLI) or Browning Ferris Gas Services, Inc. (BFG) for costs incurred in complying with New York state environmental regulations regarding the monitoring of radon and for lost revenues pertaining to the Seaway Landfill at Tonawanda, New York. The Appellant asserts that the amount of money at issue is greater than $20 million and would have a significant impact on the nature and extent of the FUSRAP cleanup proposed for the Tonawanda site. Consequently, according to the Appellant, release of the documents would be in the public interest since they are necessary for informed public participation in the environmental review process at the Tonawanda site.

The Appellant also asserts that the DOE conducted an inadequate search for documents responsive to Categories 1, 2 and 3 of the Request. With regard to the search for documents responsive to Category 1, the Appellant asserts that the June 7, 1995 letter referred to in Category 1 states that the author of the letter believed that his indemnification proposal should form the basis for further discussions and requested that DOE contact him for further discussions. The Appellant asserts that no documents have been identified by OR which relate to subsequent meetings and that consequently additional documents must exist pertaining to those meetings.

The Appellant asserts that the two documents which were released by ES pursuant to Category 2 of the Request indicate that it searched only for documents concerning the legal basis for DOE's position regarding ownership of 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material at the Tonawanda site alone. The Appellant asserts that its request was for information pertaining to the DOE's position regarding ownership of 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material at each of its FUSRAP sites, not just the Tonawanda site. Because the Appellant believes that 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material is an issue at all of the DOE's FUSRAP sites, it believes that ES's search was inadequate.

The next argument on appeal relates to Category 3 of the Request. In that category F.A.C.T.S. asks for documents "of the Atomic Energy Commission establishing the creation of the Formerly Utilized MED/AEC Sites Remedial Action Program (FUSRAP) in 1974." The Appellant notes that the only document it received responsive to this request was a document with four attached memoranda, none of which mentions FUSRAP by name. The Appellant points out that the document contains several comments such as "this appears to be the earliest document which can be tied to what FUSRAP is currently doing." However, the Appellant asserts that its request does not ask for the earliest documents which can be "tied" to FUSRAP, but rather documents which created or established the program in substantially the form it exists today. The Appellant argues that a reasonable interpretation of the Category 3 request would encompass, among other items, materials relating to the formal designation of the program, the authority pursuant to which it was created, its statement of purpose and its organizational structure and operating budget. Consequently, the Appellant believes the search OR conducted for Category 3 documents was inadequate.

Lastly, the Appellant challenges OR's denial of a fee waiver. The Appellant asserts that OR had granted it a fee waiver in earlier requests. The Appellant also asserts that in the present request, it stated that it was requesting a fee waiver for the same reasons outlined in a prior April 12, 1995 letter (1995 letter) to OR concerning a prior FOIA request. The Appellant asserts that the documents would not serve to further any commercial, trade or profit interest. Further, the Appellant argues that the fact that the subject of its present request may be broader than its earlier requests is irrelevant to the determination as to whether it should be granted a fee waiver. The Appellant also challenges its classification as "commercial" by OR for fee calculation purposes and asserts that the requested documents would further no commercial purpose.

III. Adequacy of OR's Determination

After conducting a search for responsive documents under the FOIA, the agency is required by statute to provide the requester with a written determination notifying the requester of the results of that search and, if applicable, of the agency's intention to withhold any of the responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). The statute further requires that the agency provide the requester with an opportunity to appeal any adverse determination. Id.

The written determination serves to inform the requester of the results of the agency's search for responsive documents and of any information that the agency has withheld. In doing so, the determination letter allows the requester to decide if the agency's response was adequate and proper and provides this Office a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal. Research Information Services, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,139 (1996) (RIS).

It therefore follows that the agency has an obligation to ensure that its determination letters : (1) adequately describe the results of searches; (2) clearly indicate which information was withheld, and (3) specify the exemption(s) under which information was withheld. Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,205 at 80,767 (1996); RIS at 80,592. Generally, a description is adequate if each document is identified by a brief description of the subject matter it discusses and, if available, the date upon which the document was produced and its author and recipient. An index of documents need not, however, contain information that would compromise the privileged nature of the documents. Paul W. Fox, 25 DOE ¶ 80,150 (1995). A determination must also adequately justify the withholding of documents by explaining briefly how the claimed exemption applies to the document. Id. Without an adequately informative determination letter, the requester must speculate about the adequacy and appropriateness of the agency's determinations. RIS at 80,592.

The index of documents that OR provided does not meet these standards. The references to documents provided in the index do not provide any description of the authors or recipients of the document. Nor does the OR Determination Letter or index contain an explanation as to which specific privileges are being asserted with regard each of the withheld documents. Consequently, we will remand this matter to OR so that it can issue another, more detailed determination letter regarding the 38 withheld documents.(5) Armed with a more specific determination letter and index, the Appellant may be able to narrow the issues if it subsequently seeks to appeal the new determination.(6)

IV. Adequacy of Search

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

To examine the adequacy of the search which was conducted for documents responsive to Category 1 of the Request we contacted the FOIA Officer at OR. She informed us that OR conducted a search of the offices most likely to possess responsive documents: the Prime Contractor of the FUSRAP at OR, Bechtel National, Inc.; the OR FUSRAP program office; and the DOE Headquarters' FUSRAP office. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, OR, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (October 17, 1997). Given the facts presented above, we believe that the search which was conducted for Category 1 documents was adequate. OR officials conducted a search of all of the offices in which it believed responsive documents might exist. Further, all responsive documents were either listed in the index provided to the Appellant or referred to another DOE Operations Office so that a final determination could be issued.

We contacted an official at ES to ascertain the extent of the search which was conducted for documents responsive to Category 2 and 3 of the Request. We were informed that ES determined the DOE FUSRAP office at DOE Headquarters would be the office most likely to possess responsive documents. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Tonya Woods, ES, and Richard Cronin (October 16, 1997). We contacted an official at the DOE Headquarters' FUSRAP office to determine the extent of the search which had been made for documents pertaining to ownership of 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material (Category 2). That official informed us that to the best of his knowledge the only document which the DOE had ever created regarding ownership issues of 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material was the March 8 memorandum referenced in the Category 2 request. While he possessed a copy of the March 8 memorandum, he had no knowledge of any other 11(e)(2) Byproduct Material ownership document which ever existed regarding any FUSRAP site. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between W. Alexander Williams, Office of Eastern Area Programs, FUSRAP Team, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (October 16, 1997). Because the official had detailed knowledge regarding documents pertaining 11(e)(2) Byproduct Materials and concluded on the basis of his experience that no other documents existed, we find that the search for responsive documents for Category 2 of the Request was adequate.

With regard to Category 3, ES requested that the DOE Headquarters' FUSRAP office conduct a search for responsive documents. An official at that office informed us that all documents pertaining to the earliest origins of the program which would become FUSRAP had previously been compiled into one file and the Appellant was given copies of each of the responsive documents in the file. The Appellant's argument that the search was inadequate because other organizational documents, such as formal descriptions of FUSRAP, the authority pursuant to which FUSRAP was created, the purpose statement, the organizational structure and the operating budget, were not discovered is unavailing. The wording of the Appellant's Request, "[t]he document of the Atomic Energy Commission establishing the creation" of the FUSRAP, indicates to us that it only sought documents pertaining to the initial establishment of the FUSRAP program and not documents relating to the items mentioned in the Appellant's Appeal. The Appellant's argument seeks to broaden the scope of its Request by means of an Appeal and as such must fail. See Energy Research Foundation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529-30 (1992). If the Appellant seeks documents relating to the items mentioned in its Appeal, it may make another FOIA request for such documents.

Given the extent of the search described above, we find that the searches conducted by OR and ES for the documents requested in Categories 1, 2 and 3 were adequate.

V. Fee Waiver

The FOIA generally requires that requesters pay fees for the processing of their requests. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(i); see also 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a). However, the Act provides:

Documents shall be furnished without any charge or at a charge reduced below the fees established under clause (ii) if disclosure of the information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government and is not primarily in the commercial interest of the requester.

5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii) (1988 ed.). The burden of satisfying this two prong test is on the requester.

Larson v. Central Intelligence Agency, 843 F.2d 1481, 1483 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (per curiam) (Larson).

In the present Appeal, the Appellant argues that in its Request, it specifically sought a fee waiver for the same reasons enumerated in an April 12, 1995 letter from James Rauch, who the Appellant apparently claims was representing it. The Appellant asserts that because a fee waiver was granted to James Rauch in 1995, a fee waiver should have been granted for the present request. OR has asserted that the fee waiver granted in 1995 was granted to James Rauch as an individual and not as a representative of the Appellant. OR further asserts that it requested that Robert Rauch, the attorney representing the Appellant at the time of the present request, submit further information to justify the Appellant's fee waiver request but that Robert Rauch declined to do so.

We have reviewed James Rauch's April 12, 1995 letter. The justification for a fee waiver given in that letter recounts the individual qualifications of James Rauch and his motivation for obtaining the requested documents. In addition, James Rauch mentions that he is a member of two organizations, one of which is the Appellant. He further states that he and the two organizations have no commercial interest in the requested documents. It is apparent that James Rauch was making a fee waiver request on his own behalf and not as a representative of the Appellant. Consequently, OR properly requested from the Appellant a justification for its present fee waiver request. Because the Appellant failed to provide any justification other than James Rauch's 1995 letter, OR properly denied the Appellant's fee waiver request.(7)

With regard to OR's classification of the Appellant as a "commercial" requester, we note that a requester may be classified as "commercial" if the records requested "are requested for commercial use." 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(ii)(I); see also 10 C.F.R.§ 1004.9(b)(1). The classification of a requester as "commercial" thus depends on how the requested documents are to be used. In this Appeal, the Appellant has offered a detailed narrative as to why it seeks the requested documents. Because OR did not have the benefit of the Appellant's explanation as to why it sought the documents, we will remand this matter to OR so that it may reconsider its classification of the Appellant for fee calculation purposes.

In summary, because OR's determination letter was inadequate and further in order that we may give the Appellant a chance to be reclassified for fee calculation purposes, we will remand this matter to OR for another determination. Consequently, we will grant the Appellant's Appeal (Case No. VFA- 0343) in part. With regard to the Appellant's Appeal of ES's determination (Case No. VFA-0339), because we found that ES had conducted an adequate search for documents responsive to Categories 2 and 3 and because OR will issue another determination for the documents ES withheld, we will deny the Appellant's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by F.A.C.T.S., on October 2, 1997, Case No. VFA-0339, is hereby denied.

(2) The Appeal filed by F.A.C.T.S. on October 10, 1997, Case No. VFA-0343 is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (3), and is denied in all other respects.

(3) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(4) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

George B. Breznay

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: November 10, 1997

(1)The Office of Hearings and Appeals assigned Case No. VFA-0339 to the Appellant's Appeal of ES's determination and Case No. VFA-0343 to its Appeal of OR's determination.

(2)The Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) instituted a program which would eventually become FUSRAP in 1974 to study former Manhattan Engineering District (MED) and AEC sites. Most of these sites had been used in the early period of the domestic atomic energy program and had been initially cleaned up under the environmental standards in effect during that period. FUSRAP seeks to determine which sites need additional cleanup and effect further clean up of those sites.

(3)In addition, OR referred two other responsive documents to the Savannah River Operations Office so that it could issue a determination to the Appellant regarding those documents.

(4)11(e)(2) Byproduct Material is byproduct material produced from the extraction of uranium or thorium ores.

(5)If OR believes that the identity of the individuals named in the documents is privileged information, it may choose, in lieu of naming the authors and recipients, to include in its index general information terms, such as "a DOE official," which describe the authors and recipients. However, at this time we do not rule on the issue as to whether such names may be properly withheld under these circumstances pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA.

(6)Because of the inadequate description of the documents provided to the Appellant, we are unwilling at this time to decide on the appropriateness of the application of Exemption 5 to the documents. Moreover, it is unclear from the OR Determination Letter if OR considered a discretionary release of the withheld documents notwithstanding its preliminary determination that Exemption 5 was applicable to the documents. Consequently, on remand OR should make a specific finding as to whether a discretionary release of the documents, Exemption 5 notwithstanding, is appropriate. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We also note that with regard to the documents that ES withheld, the description of the documents withheld suffers from the same defects present in the OR Determination Letter. However, we will not require ES to issue another determination letter because all of the documents withheld by ES are included in the documents withheld by OR.

(7) Because we find that the 1995 letter failed to provide sufficient fee waiver information in support of the Appellant's fee waiver request, we need not decide on the Appellant's other arguments regarding OR's failure to grant it a fee waiver. However, we note that OR has informed us that it would reconsider the Appellant's fee waiver request upon the Appellant's submission of additional information.

November 7, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Convergence Research

Date of Filing: October 9, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0340

On October 9, 1997, Convergence Research (CR) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) from a determination that DOE's Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) issued to CR on September 16, 1997. That determination concerned a request for information CR submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, BPA would be required to release the responsive material to CR.

I. Background

The BPA, a federal agency within the DOE, was created by Congress in 1937 to market low-cost hydroelectric power generated by the Federal Columbia River Power System, a series of dams along the Columbia River in Oregon and Washington. 16 U.S.C. §§ 832-832m. Congress later expanded BPA's mandate to include marketing authority over almost all electric power generated by federal facilities in the Pacific Northwest. 16 U.S.C. §§ 838b, 838f. In 1980, Congress passed the Pacific Northwest Electric Power Planning and Conservation Act, 16 U.S.C. § 839, to ensure that BPA's low cost power would continue to be marketed to existing BPA customers. Congress also required the BPA to offer initial long-term (20 year) firm power sales contracts to all existing BPA public body and cooperative customers (public agency customers). 16 U.S.C. § 839c(g)(1)(A). By 1982, BPA had executed contracts with approximately 140 public agency customers. Memorandum from Timothy Johnson, Office of General Counsel, BPA, to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (October 27, 1997) (BPA Memo).

Prior to 1994, BPA published annually customer sales and generation statistics, containing data derived from customer power bills. This data consisted of annual energy demand, deliveries, and revenues generated by customer. However, after the passage of the Energy Policy Act of 1992, Pub. L. No. 102-486, 106 Stat. 2776 (1992), deregulation of the wholesale electricity market resulted in competitors entering BPA's existing market. BPA Memo at 2. BPA began to feel the effects of this new competition by 1994. Id. One intent of the Energy Policy Act was to promote greater competition in bulk power marketing by encouraging new entrants. Association of Public Agency Customers, Inc. v. Bonneville Power Administration, 1997 WL 586809, at *3 (9th Cir. Sept. 24, 1997). Congress sought to encourage wholesale power marketing competition between utilities and independent power producers and thereby reduce the cost of electricity to consumers. Id. at *4. As a result, the price of wholesale power in the Pacific Northwest dropped, and BPA faced price competition for the first time in its history. Id. With the published annual statistics, BPA's new competitors had access to the market profile of any BPA customer, and thus armed "are assumed to have been able to undercut BPA in its attempt to either retain customers or compete for those customers with access to the market." BPA Memo at 2. BPA then began "a process of re- engineering itself to resemble more closely a private sector utility. As part of this process, BPA has engaged in an ongoing process of analyzing the markets in which it now competes, its potential customer base and its pricing strategy." Ball, Janik and Novack, 25 DOE ¶ 80,197 (1996) (Ball). See also The Oregonian, Case No. VFA-0336, 26 DOE ¶ (November 3, 1997) (The Oregonian). Consequently, BPA has determined that the annual customer sales statistics have become commercial information and are treated as confidential. BPA Memo at 2. In August 1997, CR requested that BPA release on an ongoing basis:

Copies of capacity and energy sales and revenue information for each BPA customer, for calendar year 1995, fiscal year 1995, calendar year 1996, fiscal year 1996, and all future fiscal and calendar years. The data should identify all BPA customers and show, by customer, the HLH firm Demand in kW for each customer, Energy Deliveries in kWh for each customer, Dollar Revenues from each customer, the mills/kWh rate paid by each customer, and all applicable rate schedules in effect for each customer.

Letter from Kevin Bell (Bell), Principal, Convergence Research, to FOIA Compliance Officer, BPA (August 6, 1997). Bell attached a sample containing information "from the publicly available BPA Calendar Year 1994 Generation and Power Sales document." Id. Bell indicated that the material was required for "ongoing detailed research, public education and advocacy on the policies and practices of BPA in a restructured electric market environment." Id.

On August 18, 1997, BPA acknowledged the receipt of CR's request and stated, correctly, that the FOIA applies only to documents already in existence and cannot be used on an "ongoing" basis. Letter from FOI Officer, BPA, to CR (August 18, 1997). On August 22, 1997, BPA informed CR that the Generation and Power Sales document had been discontinued. Letter from Senior Vice President, Power Business Line, BPA to CR (August 22, 1997). However, BPA provided CR with a copy of the replacement document, "Generation and Sales Statistics," an aggregation of sales information by fiscal year, similar in content and format to a corporate income statement. Id. On September 16, 1997, BPA indicated that it had identified a responsive customer sales document containing demand, average rates, and revenue for each customer. Letter from Steven Hickok, Senior Vice President, Power Business Line, BPA, to CR (September 16, 1997). Nonetheless, BPA withheld this information under Exemption 5 because it was now considered confidential commercial information in view of the post-Energy Policy Act business environment. Id. On October 9, 1997, Bell filed this Appeal on behalf of CR.

II. Analysis

The FOIA generally requires that federal agencies release documents to the public upon request. However, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149, 95 S. Ct. 1504, 1515 (1975) (Sears). However, the Supreme Court has recognized that Exemption 5 also incorporates those "privileges which the Government enjoys under the relevant statutory and case law in the pre-trial discovery context." Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184, 95 S.Ct. 1491, 1500 (1975). Accordingly, "[t]he test under Exemption 5 is whether the documents would be ?routinely' or ?normally' disclosed upon a showing of relevance." F.T.C. v. Grolier, 462 U.S. 19, 26, 103 S. Ct. 2209, 2214 (1983) (citing Sears, 421 U.S. at 148-49, 95 S. Ct. at 1515 (1975)). Therefore, if a privilege is well recognized by statute or in the case law, it may properly be invoked under Exemption 5. See United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 465 U.S. 797, 799-801, 104 S. Ct. 1488, 1492-93 (1984).

A. The Confidential Commercial Information Privilege

Among the privileges incorporated by the courts under Exemption 5 is the "confidential commercial information privilege." See, e.g., Federal Open Market Comm. v. Merrill, 443 U.S. 340, 99 S. Ct. 2800 (1979) (Merrill) (holding that since disclosure of Domestic Policy Directives would significantly harm the Government's monetary functions or commercial interests, they could properly be withheld under Exemption 5); Government Land Bank v. General Services Administration, 671 F.2d 663 (1st Cir. 1982) (Land Bank) (withholding a government generated real estate appraisal); Hack v. Department of Energy, 538 F. Supp. 1098 (D.D.C. 1982) (holding that conceptual design reports utilized in procuring architectural services were confidential commercial information properly withheld under Exemption 5 prior to selection of the successful bidder) (Hack).

"The Federal courts have long recognized a qualified evidentiary privilege for trade secrets and other confidential commercial information." Merrill, 443 U.S. at 356, 99 S. Ct. at 2810. In fact, the Supreme Court looked to Rule 26(c)(7) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides that a district court may prevent or restrict discovery of confidential commercial information, and concluded that Exemption 5 incorporates a qualified privilege for confidential commercial information, at least to the extent that this information is generated by the Government itself in the process leading up to awarding a contract. Id. The courts have applied this privilege in the FOIA context to prevent the Government from being placed at a competitive disadvantage and to facilitate the consummation of contracts. Id., 443 U.S. at 360, 99 S. Ct. at 2812. Exemption 5 therefore "protects the government when it enters the marketplace as an ordinary commercial buyer or seller." Land Bank, 671 F.2d at 665 (footnote omitted).

B. The Agency's Burden Under the Privilege

The protection that this privilege affords is limited in scope and lasts only as long as necessary to protect the government's commercial interests. Merrill, 443 U.S. at 360, 99 S. Ct. at 2812; Hack, 538 F. Supp. at 1104. Moreover, the application of this privilege is not automatic. Merrill, 443 U.S. at 362, 99 S. Ct. at 2813. The burden is upon the agency to show that the records it seeks to withhold under the privilege are confidential and that their disclosure might be harmful. American Standard v. Pfizer, Inc., 828 F.2d 734, 746 (Fed. Cir. 1987) (applying the privilege in the civil discovery context). In the civil discovery context, once these burdens are met, the burden shifts to the party seeking disclosure to prove that disclosure should occur by establishing a substantial need for those documents. R&D Business Systems v. Xerox Corp., 152 F.R.D. 195, 196-197 (D. Colo. 1993) (Xerox). In the FOIA context, however, the individual FOIA applicant's need for information is not to be taken into account in determining whether materials are exempt under Exemption 5. See Merrill, 443 U.S. at 362-63, 99 S. Ct. at 2813, and cases cited therein. Accordingly, courts have found that documents which are immune from discovery absent a showing of substantial need are not "routinely" or "normally" available to parties in litigation and therefore are exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 5. F.T.C. v. Grolier, Inc., 462 U.S. 19, 27, 103 S. Ct. 2209, 2214 (1983). Therefore, if the agency has shown that it has maintained the confidentiality of the withheld records and that their release might result in harm to the government's commercial interests, the agency could properly withhold the records under Exemption 5.

1. Confidentiality

In the present case, there is no indication in the record that BPA has not maintained the confidentiality of the documents in question. In fact, BPA states in its "Billing Data Request Guidelines" that customer-specific data are released only to the customer or to authorized BPA personnel. See Attachment C to BPA Memo. We therefore turn to the next issue before us: whether release of the customer lists would likely result in harm to BPA's commercial interests, including its ability to consummate contracts.

2. Harm to Agency's Commercial Interests

Bell argues that "[t]here is no particular reason why information readily available in 1994 should suddenly be a vital secret in 1995. The information requested has no relation to current operations. It is history with no residual time value." Appeal at 3. He further submits that because BPA's financial structure and revenue requirements are public information, competitors already know how much BPA must charge to recover its costs. Id.

We conclude that, contrary to Bell's assertions, the change in the wholesale electricity market that occurred after the passage of the Energy Policy Act justifies BPA's current withholding of confidential commercial information developed after this market transformation. BPA began to feel the effects of the new law in 1994, and consequently took steps to protect customer information that it had previously shared with the public. BPA Memo at 2. Release of the withheld information would provide BPA's new competitors with otherwise unavailable insight into BPA's potential future marketing strategies. BPA developed this information for the purpose of enabling it to formulate a marketing strategy for securing its existing customer base and possibly broadening that base as well. If BPA's competitors obtained this marketing information, it would provide them with valuable insights into BPA's future marketing strategy, hindering BPA's ability to compete in the manner of a private sector actor. See Xerox, 152 F.R.D. at 197 (disclosure of marketing strategy and research would cause competitive harm); In Re Adobe Systems, Inc. Securities Litigation, 141 F.R.D. 155, 162 (disclosure of documents containing marketing information would educate competitors and would adversely affect negotiating leverage with customers); Weed Associates, 24 DOE ¶ 80,159 at 80,645 (1994) (disclosure of future marketing plans would likely cause substantial harm to competitive position); Ball, 25 DOE at 80,744 (release of BPA customer lists would provide BPA competitors with insight into potential BPA marketing strategy); The Oregonian (release of BPA customer information would compromise BPA's market strategy). If BPA's present and potential customers obtained this information, it would provide them with undue leverage in future contract negotiations for the purchase of electrical services from BPA. Id. Accordingly, BPA has established a likelihood of significant competitive harm that would result from release of the sales statistics. We therefore find that they are properly withheld under Exemption 5.

C. Public Interest in Disclosure

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requestor. DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We find that release of the withheld material would not be in the public interest. Bell argues that the public interest in this information lies in its importance to customers trying to obtain cost-based rates. Although release of this data would provide some benefit to such customers, it would be far outweighed by the harm that BPA would suffer from the disclosure of confidential commercial information to its competitors. Accordingly, we conclude that release of the withheld material protected under Exemption 5 would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the confidential commercial information privilege. See Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (stating that the Department of Justice will defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Convergence Research, OHA Case No. VFA-0340, on October 9, 1997, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: James R. Hutton

Date of Filing: October 14, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0341

On October 14, 1997, James R. Hutton (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on September 23, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge). In that determination, Oak Ridge withheld one and released another of the documents that the Appellant requested under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. It refused to confirm or deny the existence of a third document. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release any withheld documents.

I. BACKGROUND

On September 9, 1997, the Appellant submitted a request for information to Oak Ridge concerning a Reduction in Force (RIF) expected to occur at Oak Ridge on September 5, 1997 (the September RIF). (1) The Appellant sought copies of the complete "retention register" in effect on September 5, 1997 (Document 1); the listing of the positions to be affected by the September RIF (Document 2); and a copy of the RIF notice that was going to be sent to the Appellant (Document 3). September 9, 1997 Request. On September 25, 1997, Oak Ridge issued a determination in response to this request releasing Document 2 to the Appellant, withholding Document 1 in its entirety under Exemption 6, and refusing to confirm or deny the existence of any document matching the description of Document 3. On October 14, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that Oak Ridge's determinations concerning Documents 1 and 3 were improper.

II. ANALYSIS

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemptions 5 and 6 are at issue in the present case.

Document 1 is a copy of the retention register for the Oak Ridge Operations Office which was in effect at the time of the proposed RIF. Oak Ridge withheld Document 1 in its entirety under Exemption 6. Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10

C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy under Exemption 6. See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

Oak Ridge found that the release of Document 1 would result in the invasion of individual privacy interests. Specifically, Oak Ridge found that:

Releasing job series classifications could reasonably identify Federal Employees who are the subject of a pending RIF and lead to unwarranted intrusions into both the personal and professional lives of those employees.

Determination Letter at 1. This determination fails to adequately explain why the retention register was withheld in its entirety. After reviewing portions of a similar retention register, we are convinced that by segregating and withholding only that information in the retention register that would reveal the identities of specific individual, the information contained in the retention register can be released without invading any individual privacy interests. Based on the record before us, we find that the only portions of the retention register in which there are privacy interests are the names of individuals and their position numbers. (2) Release of such information would reveal the identities of particular federal employees. A third party might then link the names or position numbers (each of which corresponds to a particular employee) to the rest of the information contained in the retention register, which in turn could be used to publicly reveal individual employee's performance appraisals and vulnerability to a reduction in force. Performance appraisals and vulnerability to reductions in force are types of personnel information Congress sought to protect when it created Exemption 6.

Because we have found a privacy interest in the names and position numbers of federal employees contained in retention registers, we must next determine the public interest in their disclosure. In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 109 S. Ct. at 1481-84. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 1483. Consequently, the Court held, only that information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

We find that the names and position numbers contained in the retention register reveal little or nothing about the operations and activities of the government. Therefore, after weighing the evident privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing the identities of federal employees could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. We are therefore remanding this portion of the Appeal to Oak Ridge with instructions to release, to the Appellant, a copy of the requested retention register with the names and position numbers of all employees other than the Appellant redacted.

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about DOE actions, we are also mindful of the need to preserve the privacy rights of individuals. By releasing the responsive document with only those redactions necessary to prevent identification of specific individuals, the agency can provide as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights.

The Appellant requested a copy of any RIF notice that would have been sent to him if the September 1997 RIF had occurred. Oak Ridge would neither confirm nor deny the existence of any document meeting this description, claiming that if it were to do so, its deliberative process would be revealed.

An agency's statement in response to a FOIA request that it will neither confirm nor deny the existence of records is commonly called a "Glomar" response. A Glomar response is justified when the records sought, if they exist, would be exempt from disclosure under an applicable FOIA exemption, and the confirmation of the existence of such records would itself reveal exempt information. See Antonelli v. F.B.I., 721 F.2d 615 (7th Cir. 1983); William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996). However, the use of Glomar responses should be limited to those instances where it is absolutely necessary.

Exemption 5 exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege, and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 54, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980). In the present case, only the "deliberative process privilege" is at issue.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The document at issue was clearly predecisional (if it existed) since it was never formally adopted as an expression of the agency's policy. However, the document does not appear to be deliberative. Instead, the agency would have drafted documents of this type after it had produced a retention register which reflected the agency's assignment of employees to specific competitive areas and ranking of those employees' dates of entry, as well as a list of positions to be subject to the reduction in force. Since employees subject to the proposed RIF in Oak Ridge were given an opportunity to review the retention register for their competitive areas and since a list of positions to be subject to the RIF was made publicly available, confirming or denying the existence of a particular RIF notice would not reveal any information not already made available to the individual to whom it was directed or to the world at large. Therefore, Oak Ridge should not have used a Glomar response in this case. Confirming or denying the existence of Document 3 would not inhibit the agency's deliberative process. (3) Accordingly, we find that Oak Ridge could not properly refuse to confirm or deny the existence of the RIF notice under Exemption 5. We are therefore remanding this portion of the Appeal to Oak Ridge with instructions to issue a new determination letter concerning the requested RIF notice.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by James R. Hutton on October 14, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0341) is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Oak Ridge Operations Office for future processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

(1) The September RIF never took place.

(2) The Appellant's name and position number cannot be withheld from the Appellant because releasing information to the Appellant about himself would not invade his privacy interests.

(3) It is important to note that we are not ruling on whether or not the information contained in the RIF notice, if it exits, could properly be withheld under Exemption 5 or any other FOIA Exemption.

October 31, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: ChemData, Inc.

Date of Filing: October 14, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0342

On October 14, 1997, ChemData, Inc. (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on September 9, 1997, by the Rocky Flats Field Office (RFFO) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied a request for information submitted by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require RFFO to release the requested information.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the type of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is permitted by federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On January 10, 1997, the Appellant filed a request under the FOIA in which it sought "a copy of the selected Bid Prices for Data Validation work, under [Kaiser-Hill Company's] current TechLaw contract." This FOIA request was incorrectly filed with RFFO's management and operating contractor, Kaiser-Hill Company (Kaiser-Hill), instead of with RFFO as required by 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4. The request was, however, forwarded to RFFO, and RFFO issued a determination to the Appellant on September 9, 1997. In that determination, RFFO found that the records sought by the Appellant are not "agency records" because they were not in the possession and control of the agency at the time of the FOIA request. RFFO further explained that under the terms of the contract between DOE and Kaiser-Hill, all procurement records are owned by the contractor and therefore not subject to release under DOE regulations. Electronic Mail from Mary Hammack, FOIA Officer, RFFO, to Appellant (September 9, 1997).

In its Appeal, the Appellant claims that all taxpayer-funded records are subject to release under the FOIA. It also argues that all contracting or subcontracting records under DOE procurement are DOE property.(1) See Letter from Ann Mary Nefcy, Senior Chemist, to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (October 14, 1997) (Appeal Letter).

II. Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether procurement records between a DOE contractor and sub-contractor which were in the possession of the DOE contractor at the time of the request are subject to the FOIA. Contrary to the Appellant's unsupported assertion, not all "taxpayer-funded records" are subject to review under the FOIA. Rather, we must first determine whether such records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). Records that do not meet these criteria may nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations if they are owned by the government. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information required to be made available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-stage analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as Kaiser-Hill, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., The Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,205 (1997); Diane C. Larson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 (1996); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA, and if not (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether an entity should be regarded as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case which involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974); cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, Kaiser-Hill is the prime contractor responsible for maintaining and operating the Rocky Flats Environmental Technology Site. This Office has frequently held that DOE management and operating contractors are not "agencies" for FOIA purposes. See, e.g., The Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,205 (1997) (Fluor Daniel Fernald); Diane C. Larson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 (1996) (Westinghouse Hanford Company); William Kuntz III, 25 DOE ¶ 80,157 (1995) (Lockheed Martin Corporation); Cowles Publishing Co., 24 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1994) (Battelle Memorial Institute). As in those other cases, the DOE has obtained Kaiser-Hill's services and exercises general control over the contract work, but it does not supervise Kaiser-Hill's day-to- day operations. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Mary Hammack and Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA (October 20, 1997). Therefore, Kaiser-Hill does not meet the test set forth in the Orleans and Forsham decisions and we therefore conclude that Kaiser-Hill is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although Kaiser-Hill is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, records in its possession which are responsive to the Appellant's request could be deemed "agency records" if they were obtained by the DOE and were within the DOE's control at the time the FOIA request was made. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989) (Tax Analysts); see also Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. However in this case, the documents in question had not been obtained by the DOE and were not in the agency's possession at the time of the Appellant's request. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Mary Hammack and Dawn Goldstein (October 20, 1997).

Even if a contractor-acquired record fails to qualify as an "agency record," it may still be subject to voluntary release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations state that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

We therefore next look to the contract between DOE and Kaiser-Hill to determine the status of the withheld records. That contract states:

Except as is provided in paragraph (b) of this clause, all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government and shall be delivered to the Government . . . .

Contract DE-AC34-95RF00825, Section H.4. Paragraph (b) excludes from this provision "all records related to any procurement action by the Contractor." Id. at Clause H.20(b)(8). Thus, contrary to the Appellant's assertion, not all procurement records of DOE contractors are owned by the DOE. In this case, because procurement records are not among the records which are property of the Government under the DOE's contract with Kaiser-Hill, these records are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the records sought by the Appellant are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA, nor subject to release under DOE regulations. Accordingly, the Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by ChemData, Inc. on October 14, 1997, Case Number VFA-0342, is hereby denied.

Office of Hearings and Appeals

(1)*/ In its Appeal, the Appellant also requests all prices for all Data Validation contract or subcontract awards to TechLaw, Inc., under any contracts between DOE and Kaiser-Hill. Documents regarding TechLaw, Inc. contracts other than the current contract with Kaiser- Hill Company are clearly outside the scope of the Appellant's initial FOIA request. The OHA will therefore not consider this request in the context of the present Appeal. Cox Newspapers, 22 DOE ¶ 80,106 at 80,512 (1992). Accordingly, the Appellant should, if it so wishes in light of our result below, file a new request for information regarding other contracts.

The Appellant also asserts in its Appeal that although it had requested information pertaining to the current DOE/Kaiser-Hill contract, RFFO's determination concerned only the DOE/Kaiser-Hill contract covering the period July 1, 1995 to June 30, 1996. That assertion is incorrect. In its response, RFFO referred to the contract which has been in continuous effect between DOE and Kaiser-Hill from April 4, 1995 to the present.

Case No. VFA-0345, 26 DOE ¶ 80,236

December 2, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Glen M. Jameson

Date of Filing: November 4, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0345

On November 4, 1997, Glen M. Jameson filed an Appeal from a determination that the Office of Headquarters Procurement Services (PS) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him on September 17, 1997. In that determination, PS denied in part a request for information Mr. Jameson filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require PS to release the information that Mr. Jameson requested.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On October 21, 1996, Mr. Jameson filed a Request for Information with the Eastern Region Defense Contract Audit Agency. A portion of that request was referred to PS. That portion of the request sought a copy of a DCAA audit report number 1211-91Q28000856, "Application of Agreed-Upon Procedures For Review of Proposed Direct Labor and Indirect Expense Rate" for PAI Corporation.

PS issued a determination on September 17, 1997, in which it identified a responsive document, but concluded that portions of this document were exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). The withheld portions included proposed and audit- adjusted rates, proposed labor overhead rates, percentage increase in officers' salaries, amount of relocation expense, contractor's historical relocation expense, 1992 proposed labor overhead rate, proposed full or part-time fringe and tax rates, general and administrative (G&A) rates and employee names. According to PS, a release of the information relating to costs or fees would "disclose the submitter's plan for renumeration of its employees, its methods of allocating costs, its indirect rate structures, its allocation of resources and insight into its approach to the proposed work." See Determination Letter at 1.

On November 4, 1997, Mr. Jameson filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) contending that the disclosure of the requested DCAA audit report is not likely to impair the Government's ability to obtain similar information in the future and also that its disclosure is not likely to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of PAI Corporation. See Appeal Letter at 1-5.

II. Analysis

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (a) trade secrets or (b) information which is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (i) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (ii) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information that is provided to an agency voluntarily is considered "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In choosing between these two tests, we have held consistently that information submitted in response to a request for proposal is submitted involuntarily and therefore is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

DOE regulations further outline the criteria for determining the applicability of Exemption 4. Such criteria include whether (1) the information has been held in confidence by the person to whom it pertains, (2) the information is customarily [and reasonably] held in confidence by the person to whom it pertains, (3) the information was transmitted to and received by the DOE in confidence, (4) the information is available from public sources, (5) the disclosure of the information is likely to impair the [g]overnment's ability to obtain similar information and (6) the disclosure of the information is likely to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11(f)(1)-(6). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE must solicit the submitter's views regarding the impact of release of the information if the DOE is considering release. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11(c). The submitter's view of the impact of the release of the information is only one factor to be evaluated and weighed in the analysis, which must involve a balancing of the objective standards set forth in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11(f). PS obtained comments from PAI Corporation in this case. PAI Corporation claims that all of the redacted information is proprietary and that its release would competitively harm PAI Corporation.

Regarding whether portions of the document at issue are "confidential," we have consistently held that information submitted in connection with a Request for Proposal is not submitted voluntarily and is therefore to be considered confidential only if it meets the test set out in National Parks. E.g., Glen M. Jameson, 25 DOE ¶ 80,191 (1996). The federal courts have reasoned that even though such submissions are voluntary in the sense that no company is forced to do business with the government, information required by the terms of a Request for Proposal must be submitted if "contractors want to win lucrative government contracts . . . " McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. NASA, No. 91-3134, slip op. at (D.D.C. June 30, 1995).

Similarly in the present case, the information submitted by PAI Corporation was required to be submitted in order for the company to do business with a government project, and specifically in order to receive reimbursement once that project was terminated. Indeed, PAI Corporation did not argue, nor did PS conclude, that information in the document at issue was submitted voluntarily. Accordingly, we will find the information at issue to be "confidential" only to the extent that its disclosure is likely either to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the submitter, PAI Corporation.

PS's decision to withhold portions of the DCAA audit report is based upon its assertion that PAI Corporation would be placed at a competitive disadvantage in the marketplace. Specifically, it asserts that release of the withheld cost and fee information would provide PAI Corporation's competitors with an advantage in anticipating contractors' responses in future competitions and would aid in attempting to hire away contractors' employees. Determination Letter at 2. We agree with PS that release of this information is likely to cause competitive harm to PAI Corporation.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has held that, in a competitive market, information that would reveal the profit rates, general and administrative rates, and overhead of a competitor company is exempt from release under the FOIA. Gulf & W. Indus., Inc. v. United States, 615 F.2d 527 (D.C. Cir. 1979). Courts have further recognized this information as "competitively sensitive information" which is protected under Exemption 4. General Dynamics Corp., Space Sys. Div. v. Department of the Air Force, 822 F. Supp. 804 at 806 (D.D.C. 1992); Braintree Elec. Light Dep't v. Department of Energy, 494 F. Supp. 287 (D.D.C. 1980) (profit and overhead protected under Exemption 4). Similarly in the present case, the withheld employee cost and fee information is the kind of information that is typically withheld under Exemption 4. Release of this information could enable rival companies to learn detailed information about the submitter's profit margins and to adopt a strategy to undercut the submitter and eliminate it from effective competition. Although we agree that release of this information could cause competitive harm to PAI Corporation, we shall consider whether more responsive information could be segregated from the requested document and released without competitive harm.

The Appellant has indicated that he is particularly interested in the pension cost component of the overhead and G&A rates of PAI Corporation's employees. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Mr. Glen M. Jameson and Kimberly Jenkins-Chapman, OHA (November 21, 1997). In light of this fact, PS has informed us that it may be possible to release this specific information to Mr. Jameson. Therefore, we will remand this matter to PS for further segregation and release of possibly non-exempt material. We believe that PS is in the best position to make a determination as to whether the release of the information that Mr. Jameson has described would cause substantial harm to the competitive position of PAI Corporation.

The DOE regulations provide that material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is permitted by federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. However, in cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that can be withheld pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See e.g. Painters District Council No. 55, 24 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1994). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information in this case.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons explained above, we will remand this case to PS, which shall promptly issue a new determination releasing non-exempt information to the Appellant in accordance with this decision, or shall explain in detail its reasons for withholding any of the information at issue. In all other respects, the present appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Glen M. Jameson, OHA Case No. VFA-0345, on November 4, 1997, is hereby granted in part as set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Office of Headquarters Procurement Services for further consideration in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0346, 26 DOE ¶ 80,234

November 19, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

APPEAL

Name of Petitioner: Los Alamos Study Group

Date of Filing: October 21, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0346

On October 21, 1997, the Los Alamos Study Group (the Study Group) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE). The Study Group appeals from a determination issued by the Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque) on October 7, 1997, in response to a request for information filed by the Study Group under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In this Appeal, the Study Group has requested that OHA direct Albuquerque to conduct an additional search for responsive records and prepare an index of responsive, classified documents.

BACKGROUND

On June 2, 1997, the Study Group submitted a FOIA request seeking unclassified documents relating to projects that it claims have been planned or conducted at the Los Alamos Neutron Science Center (LANSCE), the Dual-Axis Radiographic Hydrodynamic Testing (DARHT) facility, the Pulsed-High-Energy Radiographic Machine Emitting X-Ray (PHRMEX) facility, the Flash X-Ray (FXR) facility, and a fifth named facility. The Study Group also indicated that "[f]or classified documents, we request a listing of document titles."

On October 7, 1997, Albuquerque issued a determination letter in response to the Study Group's FOIA request. This letter stated that:

The Los Alamos National Laboratory, at the request of the Los Alamos Area Office, searched for responsive unclassified records to your request and no records were located. There is no listing of classified document titles.

On October 21, 1997, the Study Group appealed this determination on the grounds that Albuquerque failed to conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover the requested documents. In this Appeal, the Study Group stated that it had obtained three unclassified documents from another governmental source that Albuquerque would have uncovered if it had done a reasonable search. The Study Group has also requested that OHA order Albuquerque to prepare a "Vaughn-type" index of withheld documents.

As detailed below, we are remanding this matter to Albuquerque because the determination letter issued in response to the Study Group's FOIA request was based upon (1) a misunderstanding of the scope of the Study Group's request for classified documents, and (2) the incorrect assumption that the five facilities named in the Study Group's FOIA request were located at the Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL). We nevertheless find that the staff of the DOE Los Alamos Area Office and LANL performed an adequate search for responsive, unclassified documents.

The Study Group's Request for a List of Titles of Classified Documents

In its FOIA request, the Study Group had stated that "[f]or classified documents, we request a listing of document titles." This language is unclear. It could be interpreted to mean that the Study Group was seeking an existing document containing a list of titles of classified documents, or that the Study Group was requesting that Albuquerque search for responsive classified documents, and then prepare an index of the titles of classified documents that were being withheld.

Because of this ambiguity, we contacted counsel for the Study Group to ascertain the intended scope of this portion of the FOIA request. Counsel informed us that the Study Group had intended that Albuquerque search for an existing document containing a list of titles of classified documents. Counsel further stated that if such a list were not located, the Study Group had intended that Albuquerque search for all responsive classified documents, and prepare a "Vaughn" index of the classified documents that were being withheld. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Ruth Prokop and Linda Lazarus, OHA Staff Attorney (October 29, 1997).

We then contacted Albuquerque's Assistant Chief Counsel for Legal Affairs to ask how Albuquerque had construed this portion of the Study Group's FOIA request. Counsel stated that Albuquerque had understood this language to mean that the Study Group was seeking a document that contained a list of classified document titles. Counsel also stated that a search had been conducted for this document, and that no such document had been discovered. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Ronald B. O'Dowd and Linda Lazarus (October 27, 1997).

Based on this information, we find that there had been a misunderstanding between Albuquerque and the Study Group concerning the scope of the FOIA request for classified documents.(1) For this reason, we will remand this matter to permit a search for classified documents to be conducted. We further instruct Albuquerque that, to the extent possible, it must provide the Study Group with an index of the classified documents being withheld after the search for responsive classified documents has been completed.(2)

The Adequacy of the Search

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we find that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive: "[t]he standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d. 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

The Search Was Limited to the DOE Los Alamos Area Office and LANL

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted Albuquerque to discuss the search conducted in response to the Study Group's FOIA request. We were informed that the FOIA staff at Albuquerque had assumed that the five facilities named in the Study Group's FOIA request were located at LANL. Based on this assumption, the FOIA staff at Albuquerque had requested that only the DOE Los Alamos Area Office and LANL search for records that were responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request.(3) See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Linda Lazarus and Elva Barfield (November 14, 1997).

However, in reviewing this Appeal, we discovered that two of the five facilities named in the Study Group's FOIA request are not located at LANL. The Flash X-Ray (FXR) facility is at Lawrence Livermore

National Laboratory, and we are unable to ascertain whether the fifth named facility even exists. We also learned that there is a possibility that responsive documents may be located at DOE Headquarters. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between William Schwartz, Staff Attorney, OHA, and Joyce Laeser, Area Counsel for the DOE Los Alamos Area Office (November 12, 1997).

For this reason, we will remand this matter to Albuquerque to permit the FOIA staff to request that the staff at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and DOE Headquarters search for documents responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request. On remand, the Albuquerque FOIA staff should attempt to determine whether the fifth named facility listed in the Study Group's FOIA request exists, and whether it is under the control of DOE. If appropriate, the Albuquerque FOIA staff should request that the staff at this facility search for responsive records.

The Searches Actually Conducted were Adequate

The searches conducted for unclassified documents by the staff of the DOE Los Alamos Area Office and LANL were adequate. The FOIA staff at Albuquerque forwarded the Study Group's FOIA request to Perrie T. Wolford, the FOIA Coordinator at the DOE Los Alamos Area Office. Ms. Wolford concluded that the DOE Los Alamos Area Office would not have responsive records because it does not maintain records of programs being conducted at LANL. Ms. Wolford determined that responsive records, if they exist, would be at LANL. Accordingly, Ms. Wolford forwarded the FOIA request to the Information Practices Office at LANL, and requested that a search be conducted for government-owned records responsive to the request. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Linda Lazarus and Perrie Wolford (November 10, 1997).

After LANL received this request, a LANL official convened a meeting attended by representatives of the three departments that were most likely to have records responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request. After this meeting, these departments were searched for unclassified documents responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request, but no such documents were found. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Linda Lazarus and Chris Chandler, Laboratory Counsel at LANL (November 14, 1997). Based on these statements, we are convinced that the staff at the DOE Los Alamos Area Office and LANL followed procedures that were reasonably calculated to uncover unclassified documents responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request.

In its Appeal, the Study Group argued that Albuquerque could not have performed an adequate search for the requested records because the Study Group had obtained three unclassified documents from another governmental source that would have been uncovered by Albuquerque if a reasonable search had been done. We asked counsel for the DOE Los Alamos Area Office to respond to the Study Group's claim. Counsel stated that she was familiar with the documents at issue, and that these documents were not responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between William Schwartz, Staff Attorney, OHA, and Lisa Cummings, Area Counsel for the DOE Los Alamos Area Office (November 12, 1997). As these documents are not responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request, the existence of these documents does not support the Study Group's claim that the searches performed by the staffs of the DOE Los Alamos Area Office and LANL were inadequate. We therefore are not convinced by the Study Group's argument.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Los Alamos Study Group on October 21, 1997, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is remanded to Albuquerque with instructions to (1) request that personnel at the Los Alamos National Laboratory conduct a search for classified documents responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request; (2) request that personnel at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and DOE Headquarters conduct a search for classified and unclassified documents responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request; (3) determine whether the fifth facility named in the Study Group's FOIA request exists and is under the control of DOE, and, if appropriate, request that personnel at this facility conduct a search for records responsive to the Study Group's FOIA request; and (4) issue a new determination that reflects the results of the above-described searches and, if possible, provides an index that contains a general description of all withheld documents and the reason that these documents have been withheld.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of busi ness, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: November 19, 1997

(1)We find that Albuquerque's construction of this portion of the Study Group's FOIA request was reasonable, and that it was not responsible for this misunderstanding.

(2)Although case law requires that an agency prepare a Vaughn index only during the judicial review of a FOIA matter, OHA has required that determinations issued by DOE contain a general description of withheld material, and a statement of the reason for withholding each document. See, e.g., Rockwell International, 21 DOE ¶ 80,105 at 80,527 (1991); Natural Resources Defense Council, 20 DOE ¶ 80,145 at 80,627 (1990).

(3)LANL is operated by a government contractor, the University of California. The DOE Los Alamos Area Office is the DOE Office that is most closely connected with the LANL. The DOE FOIA regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. §1004.3(e)(1).

January 9, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Patricia C. McCracken

Date of Filing: December 9, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0348

This Decision and Order concerns an Appeal that Patricia C. McCracken filed from a determination issued by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Richland Operations Office (Richland). The Richland issued this determination in response to a request for information that McCracken submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require Richland to release certain documents to McCracken.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document which is exempted from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In her FOIA request, Ms. McCracken sought access to a copy of the contract awarded by the DOE to BNFL, Inc. for the Tank Waste Remediation Systems Project, and a copy of BNFL's winning proposal. In her response, the Director stated that the contract was available for public viewing and reproduction at the Richland Public Reading Room and on the Internet at the following website: http://twins.pnl.gov:8001twrs_rfp/contract.htm. However, Richland withheld BNFL's proposal in its entirety under Exemption 3 of the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). In so doing, it found that release of the proposal would violate Section 821 of the National Defense Authorization Act of 1997, P.L. 104-201 (NDAA).

In her Appeal, McCracken contends that the Director improperly applied Exemption 3 in withholding the proposal. In addition, she requests access to additional information under the FOIA. Specifically, she requests documents setting forth the job descriptions or qualifications of the "person ... or persons who have made the determination" in this Appeal. She also seeks copies of all checks issued by the DOE to BNFL, a "running total" of the funds disbursed, and the numbers of the contracts under which each of the checks was issued.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA allows agencies to withhold requested information if specifically authorized by another federal statute. However, the authorizing statute must satisfy one of two criteria. It must either (i) require that the information be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (ii) establish particular criteria for withholding or refer to particular types of information to be withheld. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). The Supreme Court has established a two-prong standard of review for Exemption 3 cases. See CIA v. Sims, 471 U.S. 159, 167 (1985). First, the agency must determine whether the statute in question is a statute of exemption as contemplated by Exemption 3. Id. at 167. Second, the agency must determine whether the withheld material satisfies the criteria of the exemption statute.

In a Decision and Order previously issued to McCracken, we found that the recently enacted NDAA is a statute of exemption for purposes of 5 U.S.C § 552(b)(3). Patricia C. McCracken, 26 DOE ¶ _____ (Case No. VFA-0337, October 30, 1997). Citing Chemical Weapons Working Group Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,170 at 80,730 (1997), we stated that the NDAA is a federal statute that contains language specifically prohibiting agencies from releasing contractor proposals under the FOIA. That statute states, in pertinent part, that "a proposal in the possession or control of an executive agency may not be made available to any person under section 552 of title 5, United States Code." NDAA, § 821(b). We therefore found that since the NDAA allows agencies no discretion in withholding certain types of information, it satisfies the first criterion of Exemption 3. McCracken has presented no arguments that convince us that this holding is incorrect. We therefore conclude that the NDAA is a statute of exemption for purposes of the FOIA.

We must next determine if the proposal that was withheld by the Director is included within the coverage of section 821(b) of the NDAA. By its terms, this provision applies to "any proposal, including a technical, management, or cost proposal, submitted by a contractor in response to the requirements of a solicitation for a competitive proposal." Id. (1) We find that BNFL's proposal was submitted in response to a solicitation for a competitive proposal, and that section 821(b) is therefore applicable. Accordingly, the Manager properly withheld that document under Exemption 3.

In her Appeal, Ms. McCracken contends that segregable portions of the proposal exist that could be released without compromising any significant national interests. Indeed, the FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). See, e.g., Greenpeace, 26 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1996). However, this provision is inapplicable here, since the proposal is exempt in its entirety from mandatory release under the FOIA. In enacting section 821(b) of the NDAA, Congress clearly intended to prohibit release under the FOIA of any part of proposals submitted in response to solicitations for competitive proposals. We therefore reject Ms. McCracken's claim that segregable portions of the proposal exist that should be released.

Finally, we note that Ms. McCracken's Appeal includes a request for information that she did not seek in her original FOIA request. We have consistently held that FOIA appellants may not broaden the scope of their requests for information on appeal. See, e.g., Energy Research Foundation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529-30 (1992); Cox Newspapers, 22 DOE ¶ 80,106 at 80,512 (1992). Consequently, Ms. McCracken's request for information concerning the qualifications of DOE personnel and any disbursements of funds to BNFL is dismissed. Ms. McCracken may refile this request with the Acting Director, FOI and Privacy Acts Division, Office of the Executive Secretariat. For the reasons set forth above, Ms. McCracken's Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Patricia C. McCracken on December 9, 1997, Case No. VFA-0348, is hereby denied.

District of Columbia.

(1)*/ Section 821(b) does not, however, "apply to any proposal that is set forth or incorporated by reference in a contract entered into between the agency and the contractor that submitted the proposal." Id. We have examined the contract between BNFL and the DOE, and we find that the proposal is not set forth or incorporated by reference in that contract.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Dykema Gossett, PLLC

Date of Filing: November 12, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0349

On November 12, 1997, the law firm of Dykema Gossett (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on October 20, 1997, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge). In that determination, Oak Ridge withheld a document entitled "Part III Prime Item Development Specification" (Part III). The Appellant had requested a copy of Part III under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release Part III.

I. BACKGROUND

On September 9, 1997, the Appellant submitted an extensive request to Oak Ridge for information relating to the Superconducting Super Collider Laboratory (SSCL). Among the items sought by the Appellant was DOE Contract No. SSC-91B-01701 between University Research Associates (URA) and General Dynamics Space Systems Division (GDSSD). On October 20, 1997, Oak Ridge issued a partial determination in response to this request releasing most of the requested contract to the Appellant. However, Oak Ridge withheld several portions of the contract under FOIA Exemption 4, including a document entitled "Part III Prime Item Development Specification" (Part III), which was withheld in its entirety. On November 12, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that Oak Ridge's determination fails to explain how release of the information contained in Part III could reasonably be expected to result in substantial competitive harm. Appeal at 2.

II. ANALYSIS

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemption 4 is at issue in the present case.

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks).

In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 1579 (1993). It is well settled that information required to be submitted in order to obtain a DOE contract is considered to be submitted on a non-voluntary basis for Exemption 4 purposes. See, e.g., Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993). Since the information contained in Part III was submitted to the DOE specifically for the purpose of acquiring a contract, it was clearly submitted involuntarily. See Industrial Constructors Corporation, 25 DOE ¶ 80,196 (1996). Since the information contained in Part III was submitted involuntarily, it is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

Both the FOIA and the DOE regulations implementing it require reasonably specific justifications for the withholding of documents or portions of documents. Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Kleppe, 547 F.2d 673 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Data Technology Industries, 4 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1979). Conclusory and generalized claims by agency officials that material is exempt from disclosure are not acceptable. Thus, an agency determination that material should be withheld under Exemption 4 because its disclosure is likely to cause substantial competitive harm must include the reasons for believing that such harm will result to the competitive position of the person from whom the information is obtained. Federal Information Tools, 3 DOE ¶ 80,163 at 80,807 (1979). An adequate explanation would, for example, indicate the type of competitive injury which would result from disclosure, and the manner in which the information, if disclosed, could be utilized by a competitor to damage the firm's market position. Exxon Co., U.S.A., 8 DOE ¶ 80,162 at 80,794-95 (1981).

Oak Ridge’s Determination Letter does not meet these standards. The Determination Letter does not contain a sufficient explanation of why Oak Ridge determined that release of Part III would cause competitive harm to the information’s submitters. In order to facilitate our review, we obtained a copy of Part III from Oak Ridge. After reviewing this document, it still was not readily apparent to us that release of the information contained in Part III could reasonably be expected to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of its submitters. Consequently, we will remand this matter to Oak Ridge so that it can issue another, more detailed determination letter regarding Part III. On remand, Oak Ridge should fully explain why releasing any information it is withholding in Part III could reasonably be expected to cause competitive harm to that information’s submitters.

We note that it appears that two important steps in applying Exemption 4 were omitted in Oak Ridge’s determination to withhold Part III. Oak Ridge should have solicited the comments of the submitters in accordance with 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11. Instead, Oak Ridge apparently relied on comments submitted in response to a somewhat similar FOIA request filed by the Appellant in 1995. Our review of those comments indicates that they are not on point. On remand, Oak Ridge should offer the submitters an opportunity, pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11, to submit comments on the releaseablity of Part III.

Moreover, our review suggests that much of the information contained in Part III could be released without causing harm to the submitters’ competitive position. The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Accordingly, Oak Ridge should also review the withheld material under the standard set forth in 5 U.S.C. § 552(b).

The DOE regulations direct the DOE to release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. However, in cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Dykema Gossett, PLLC on November 12, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0349) is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Oak Ridge Operations Office for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Convergence Research

Date of Filing: November 14, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0350

On November 14, 1997, Convergence Research (CR) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) from a determination that DOE's Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) issued to CR on October 16, 1997. That determination concerned a request for information CR submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, BPA would be required to release the responsive material to CR.

I. Background

BPA, a federal agency within the DOE, was created by Congress in 1937 to market low-cost hydroelectric power generated by the Federal Columbia River Power System, a series of dams along the Columbia River in Oregon and Washington. 16 U.S.C. §§ 832-832m (1997). Congress later expanded BPA's mandate to include marketing authority over almost all electric power generated by federal facilities in the Pacific Northwest. 16 U.S.C. §§ 838b, 838f (1997). In 1980, Congress passed the Pacific Northwest Electric Power Planning and Conservation Act, 16 U.S.C. § 839, to ensure that BPA's low cost power would continue to be marketed to existing BPA customers. Congress also required BPA to offer initial long-term (20 year) firm power sales contracts to all existing BPA public body and cooperative customers (public agency customers). 16 U.S.C. § 839c(g)(1)(A) (1997). By 1982, BPA had executed contracts with approximately 140 public agency customers. Memorandum from Timothy Johnson, Office of General Counsel, BPA, to Steve Goering, OHA Staff Attorney (December 3, 1997) (BPA Memo).

Prior to 1994, BPA published annually customer-specific sales and generation statistics, containing data derived from customer power bills. This data consisted of annual energy demand, deliveries, and revenues generated by customer. However, after the passage of the Energy Policy Act of 1992, Pub. L. No. 102-486, 106 Stat. 2776 (1992), deregulation of the wholesale electricity market resulted in competitors entering BPA's existing market. BPA Memo at 2. BPA began to feel the effects of this new competition by 1994. Id. One intent of the Energy Policy Act was to promote greater competition in bulk power marketing by encouraging new entrants. Association of Public Agency Customers, Inc. v. Bonneville Power Administration, 126 F.3d 1158, 1165 (9th Cir. Sept. 24, 1997). Congress sought to encourage wholesale power marketing competition between utilities and independent power producers and thereby reduce the cost of electricity to consumers. Id. at 1165-66. As a result, the price of wholesale power in the Pacific Northwest dropped, and BPA faced price competition for the first time in its history. Id. at 1166. With the published annual statistics, BPA's new competitors had access to the market profile of any BPA customer, and thus armed "are assumed to have been able to undercut BPA in its attempt to either retain customers or compete for those customers with access to the market." BPA Memo at 2. BPA then began "a process of re-engineering itself to resemble more closely a private sector utility. As part of this process, BPA has engaged in an ongoing process of analyzing the markets in which it now competes, its potential customer base and its pricing strategy." Ball, Janik and Novack, 25 DOE ¶ 80,197 (1996) (Ball). See also The Oregonian, Case No. VFA-0336 (November 3, 1997). Consequently, BPA has determined that the annual sales and revenue statistics on a customer by customer basis have become commercial information and are treated as confidential. BPA Memo at 2.

In September 1997, CR requested that BPA "make available for examination and selective copying, at a mutually convenient time and location, all bills for products and services provided by BPA to wholesale customers dating from January 1, 1994, to September 24, 1997." Letter from Kevin Bell, CR, to BPA (September 24, 1997).

BPA responded to CR's request on October 16, 1997, stating that [i]n addition to the amount due, individual customer power bills contain several pieces of information that in the aggregate constitute market sensitive information. Such information, if released and subsequently provided to [BPA]'s competitors, would give them otherwise unavailable insight into [BPA]'s immediate future marketing opportunities and strategy. Consistent with Exemption 5 under FOIA, [BPA] has determined that the information contained in its wholesale power bills is confidential and that the release of such information may result in harm to [BPA]'s commercial interest.

Letter from Sharon Zenner, Power Billing Manager, BPA, to Kevin Bell, CR (October 16, 1997) (citation omitted).

II. Analysis

The FOIA generally requires that federal agencies release documents to the public upon request. However, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). However, the Supreme Court has recognized that Exemption 5 also incorporates those "privileges which the Government enjoys under the relevant statutory and case law in the pre-trial discovery context." Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184 (1975). Accordingly, "[t]he test under Exemption 5 is whether the documents would be ?routinely' or ? normally' disclosed upon a showing of relevance." F.T.C. v. Grolier, 462 U.S. 19, 26 (1983) (citing Sears, 421 U.S. at 148-49 (1975)). Therefore, if a privilege is well recognized by statute or in the case law, it may properly be invoked under Exemption 5. See United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 465 U.S. 797, 799-801 (1984).

Among the privileges incorporated by the courts under Exemption 5 is the "confidential commercial information privilege." See, e.g., Federal Open Market Comm. v. Merrill, 443 U.S. 340 (1979) (Merrill) (holding that since disclosure of Domestic Policy Directives would significantly harm the Government's monetary functions or commercial interests, they could properly be withheld under Exemption 5); Government Land Bank v. General Services Administration, 671 F.2d 663 (1st Cir. 1982) (Land Bank) (withholding a government-generated real estate appraisal); Hack v. Department of Energy, 538 F. Supp. 1098 (D.D.C. 1982) (holding that conceptual design reports utilized in procuring architectural services were confidential commercial information properly withheld under Exemption 5 prior to selection of the successful bidder) (Hack).

"The Federal courts have long recognized a qualified evidentiary privilege for trade secrets and other confidential commercial information." Merrill, 443 U.S. at 356. In fact, the Supreme Court looked to Rule 26(c)(7) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides that a district court may prevent or restrict discovery of confidential commercial information, and concluded that Exemption 5 incorporates a qualified privilege for confidential commercial information, at least to the extent that this information is generated by the Government itself in the process leading up to awarding a contract. Id. The courts have applied this privilege in the FOIA context to prevent the Government from being placed at a competitive disadvantage and to facilitate the consummation of contracts. Id., 443 U.S. at 360. Exemption 5 therefore "protects the government when it enters the marketplace as an ordinary commercial buyer or seller." Land Bank, 671 F.2d at 665 (footnote omitted).

A. Whether the Documents at Issue are Inter-Agency or Intra-Agency Memorandums

The Appellant contends that the power bills withheld by BPA are not inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums and thus not within the scope of FOIA Exemption 5. CR first argues that the bills are not memoranda, as they "do not contain opinions, recommendations, analyses, or anything else relating to the thought process of any agency employee. They do not record information for internal purposes or contain any input for later decisional use." Appeal at 5. CR further contends that the bills are not inter-agency memoranda because they are "sent outside the BPA to non-agencies." Id. at 5-7. BPA states that the power bills are used for internal purposes in that they provide the source data for generating internal customer sales reports. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Timothy A. Johnson, BPA, and Steven Goering, OHA (December 8, 1997). In a recent decision on an Appeal filed by CR, we upheld BPA's withholding of these reports, which contained demand, average rates, and revenue for each of BPA's customers, under the confidential commercial information privilege of Exemption 5. See Convergence Research, Case No. VFA-0340 (November 7, 1997).

We find that the documents at issue in this case are intra-agency memoranda within the scope of Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Exemption 5 protects "communications outside the agency so long as those communications are part and parcel of the agency's deliberative process." Dow Jones & Co. v. Department of Justice, 917 F.2d 571, 574 (D.C. Cir. 1990). In the present case, it appears that BPA's power bills are not only sent to customers outside the agency, but also serve an internal agency purpose of communicating the data necessary to create customer sales reports that in turn inform BPA's decision-making process. Given this additional internal use of the power bills, we conclude that the bills qualify as intra-agency memoranda and meet the threshhold test for protection under FOIA Exemption 5.

B. Whether the Documents at Issue are Shielded by the Exemption 5 Confidential Commercial Information Privilege

1. The Agency's Burden Under the Privilege

The protection that the confidential commercial information privilege affords is limited in scope and lasts only as long as necessary to protect the government's commercial interests. Merrill, 443 U.S. at 360; Hack, 538 F. Supp. at 1104. Moreover, the application of this privilege is not automatic. Merrill, 443 U.S. at 362. The burden is upon the agency to show that the records it seeks to withhold under the privilege are confidential and that their disclosure might be harmful. American Standard v. Pfizer, Inc., 828 F.2d 734, 746 (Fed. Cir. 1987) (applying the privilege in the civil discovery context). In the civil discovery context, once these burdens are met, the burden shifts to the party seeking disclosure to prove that disclosure should occur by establishing a substantial need for those documents. R&D Business Systems v. Xerox Corp., 152 F.R.D. 195, 196-197 (D. Colo. 1993) (Xerox). In the FOIA context, however, the individual FOIA applicant's need for information is not to be taken into account in determining whether materials are exempt under Exemption 5. See Merrill, 443 U.S. at 362-63, and cases cited therein. Accordingly, courts have found that documents which are immune from discovery absent a showing of substantial need are not “routinely” or “normally” available to parties in litigation and therefore are exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 5. F.T.C. v. Grolier, Inc., 462 U.S. 19, 27 (1983). Therefore, if the agency has shown that it has maintained the confidentiality of the withheld records and that their release might harm the government’s commercial interests, the agency could properly withhold the records under Exemption 5.

2. Confidentiality

In the present case, there is no indication in the record that BPA has not maintained the confidentiality of the documents in question. In fact, BPA states in its “Billing Data Request Guidelines” that customer-specific data are released only to the customer or to authorized BPA personnel. See Attachment A to BPA Memo. We therefore turn to the next issue before us: whether release of the customer lists would likely result in harm to BPA’s commercial interests, including its ability to consummate contracts.

3. Harm to Agency’s Commercial Interests

In two very recent decisions, we found that BPA properly withheld customer-specific commercial information under the Exemption 5 confidential commercial information privilege, based upon the harm to BPA’s commercial interests that would likely result from release of the information. See Convergence Research, Case No. VFA-0340 (November 7, 1997) (demand, average rates, and revenue); The Oregonian, Case No. VFA-0336 (November 3, 1997) (load amounts and exit fees). The same considerations discussed in those decisions lead us to conclude in the present case that the release of the customer-specific information contained in the power bills withheld by BPA, including the amounts of electricity purchased and the rates at which it was sold, would likely cause competitive harm to BPA in the hands of its competitors, who could use the information in their marketing of electricity to BPA’s customers.

In reaching these conclusions, we reject as irrelevant the Appellant’s argument that our decision should be guided by Congress’ decision to “include government entrepreneurial and business-like activities (such as Amtrak and the United States Postal Service) within the reach of the FOIA . . . .” Appeal at 8. As certainly as Congress chose which entities would be subject to the FOIA generally, Congress also chose to include in the FOIA certain exemptions. And the issue before us is not whether BPA is subject to the FOIA, as it undeniably is, but whether the information in question is exempt from release under the Act.

We similarly are not persuaded by the Appellant’s assertion that any “truly determined competitor of BPA’s could obtain access to most of [the] customer bills if it were willing to make the data requests to the 170 or more customers which would be obliged to respond,” thus making it “economically feasible for a multimillion dollar power marketer to expend resources to make requests . . . upon 170 entities but extremely burdensome for a member of the public to do the same widespread gathering.” Appeal at 8-9. Assuming, arguendo, the accuracy of the Appellant’s unsupported assertion, the fact that competitors of BPA would have to expend significant resources to track down this information from “170 or more” sources merely illustrates the advantage that these same competitors would gain if BPA were to make the information publicly, and much more easily, available from one source.

Nonetheless, BPA withheld the documents at issue in their entirety, and the FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (1982). See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 89, 91 (1973); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Air Force, 556 F.2d 242, 259-62 (D.C. Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 927 (1978); Casson, Calligaro & Mutryn, 10 DOE ¶ 80,137 at 80,615 (1983). Segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary where it is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material so that release of the non-exempt material would "compromise" the withheld material, or where the amount of non-exempt material is small and so interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate. Lead Indus. Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

In the present case, we find that reasonably segregable portions of the power bills withheld by BPA can be released to the Appellant. The rationale BPA advances, and which we accept, to justify withholding the power bills goes to the customer-specific nature of the information contained in them. BPA Memo at 2-5. Based on our review of samples of the withheld documents, we believe that BPA should, without facing an inordinate burden, be able to redact any information in the bills that identifies particular customers. We will therefore remand this matter to BPA for a new determination releasing the remainder of the information in the documents or explaining in detail its reasons for withholding any of this information.(1)

In making its new determination, BPA should also take into account the fact that it has already made publicly available customer-specific information regarding its electricity sales through September 30, 1995. We find such information in a document, a copy of which was submitted by the Appellant, entitled "Generation and Power Sales," which lists sales in Calendar Year 1994. BPA has also provided us with a copy of BPA's Fiscal Year 1995 report, which contains customer-specific sales information for the period ending September 30, 1995. BPA's determination should specifically address the basis, if any, for withholding any portion of bills for sales prior to this date.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Convergence Research on November 14, 1997, Case Number VFA-0350, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Bonneville Power Administration, who shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(1)In its response to the present Appeal, BPA also contends that certain of the information withheld is exempt under Exemption 4 of the FOIA, though BPA did not cite this Exemption in its determination to the Appellant. Case No. VFA-0351, 26 DOE ¶ 80, 238

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Tod Rockefeller

Date of Filing: November 17, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0351

On November 17, 1997, Tod Rockefeller (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him on October 14, 1997. In that determination, DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office (AOO) denied in part a request for information that the Appellant filed on July 29, 1997 under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. See Letter from David L. Geary, Director, AOO, Office of Public Affairs, to Appellant (October 14, 1997) (Determination Letter). In his request, the Appellant sought from AOO all documents listing written allegations about the Appellant that George Dials, Manager of the DOE's Carlsbad Area Office, had received and which Mr. Dials had informed the Appellant he possessed.

In response to that request, AOO released two documents to the Appellant under the FOIA, but under Exemption 6 of that Act, redacted portions of both of those documents. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.(1)

Although the Appellant made his request under the FOIA, AOO initially considered whether the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008, applied to this case. The Privacy Act requires, inter alia, that each federal agency permit an individual to gain access to information pertaining to him or her that is contained in any system of records maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information is retrieved by the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.2(m). In this case, the two documents at issue were not a part of the Appellant's personnel file (or any other file) at either the Carlsbad Area Office or the Albuquerque Operations Office. Instead the documents were kept solely on Mr. Dials' desk. Therefore, the documents were never in a "system of records" subject to the Privacy Act.(2)See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Ron O'Dowd (November 19, 1997). Therefore, AOO correctly determined that only the FOIA and not the Privacy Act applies to this case. See Greentree v. United States Customs Service, 674 F.2d 74 (D.C. Cir. 1982); Jeffrey L. Turek, 11 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,678 (1983).

Exemption 6 of the FOIA shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982) (Washington Post). Furthermore, the term "similar files" has been interpreted broadly by the Supreme Court to include all information that "applies to a particular individual." Washington Post, 456 U.S. at 602. Thus, since there is no doubt that the documents at issue in this case include information that applies to the Appellant, they qualify as "similar files" under Exemption 6. See Jeffrey R. Leist, 25 DOE ¶ 80,159 at 80,651 (1996).

In order to determine whether an agency may withhold a record under Exemption 6, it must undertake a three step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a substantial privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If the agency identifies no privacy interest or a de minimis privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 772-73 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

In this case, AOO redacted identifying portions of two different memoranda. Each memorandum contains reports prepared by various individuals as well as accounts of other individuals' reported allegations of "aberrant behavior" by the Appellant, as described in the Determination Letter. According to the Determination Letter, disclosure of the withheld information would result in a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy of these individuals within the meaning of Exemption 6.

The DOE withheld identifying information from these memoranda because of a concern that its release might subject the individuals involved to harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions. In such circumstances, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests. See Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985). Accordingly, as in prior, similar cases, we have followed the courts' lead. See, e.g., James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,129 (1990). The potential for harassment, intimidation or other personal intrusions is obvious from the context of each memorandum since each contains numerous derogatory (and possibly inflammatory) statements concerning the Appellant. In fact, AOO has informed us that the Appellant has already engaged in extreme verbal harassment of co-workers based on the release of just the redacted information, see Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Ron O'Dowd (November 19, 1997), thereby making the need for protection in this case most compelling. See William Hyde, 18 DOE ¶ 80,102 at 80,508 (1988). Accordingly, we find a significant privacy interest exists in the withheld information.

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in the FOIA context, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 773. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 775. Consequently, the Court held, only information that contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

In this case, the Appellant asserts that there is a public interest at stake in upholding civil service protection laws and in permitting him to clear his name of false allegations. Neither asserted public interest meets the requirements of Reporters Committee. While there is a general governmental interest in upholding civil service protection laws, releasing the identifying portions of these allegations would not shed any light on whether DOE has taken any action that would violate these laws. Further, clearing an individual employee's reputation regarding his interpersonal skills is too narrow and not within the concept of public interest as laid out in Reporters Committee, which is to "shed light on an agency's performance of its statutory duties." 489 U.S. at 773. Accordingly, we find that there is little or no public interest in the release of the withheld information.

Because release of the identifying information in the context at issue could reasonably be expected to subject the individuals involved to harassment, intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest in releasing the information, we find that release of information revealing the co-workers' identities could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Accordingly, we find that the identifying information was properly withheld under Exemption 6.

(1) 1/ The Appellant made three further arguments in his Appeal, none of which this Office can consider. First, the Appellant challenged the AOO's statement in the Determination Letter that the redacted documents were not being used in an administrative action against him. This issue is irrelevant to the FOIA and therefore beyond the scope of this Office's jurisdiction. Second, the Appellant claimed that he is already aware of the identity of at least one person whose name the DOE redacted. However, that claim also does not affect our FOIA analysis, since speculation as to the identity of a confidential source is irrelevant to the question of whether the records are exempt. Otherwise, the privacy of persons making confidential reports would be harmed by a mere guess. In addition, the ability of the government to obtain material which would not be made available absent a promise of confidentiality would be seriously compromised. See The Die-Gem Company, Inc., 19 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,570 (1989) (Exemption 7(D)); cf. Jeffery L. Turek, 11 DOE ¶ 80,142 at 80,662 (1983) (Privacy Act). Third, the Appellant asserted that the two redacted documents released to him "were not produced on the dates annotated" and that "their content is demonstrable misinformation." See Electronic Mail from Appellant to Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA (November 20, 1997). Neither claim is relevant to the FOIA, because the FOIA is only concerned with providing agency records to the public, regardless of the accuracy of the contents. Moreover, although there is a limited right to correct wrong information about oneself under the Privacy Act, the Privacy Act is not involved in this case for the reasons explained infra.

(2) 2/ Although the DOE stamped each redacted document, "CAO [Carlsbad Area Office] Confidential Personnel File," Mr. O'Dowd assured us that the marking was done only to signify the confidential nature of the documents. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein and Ron O'Dowd,

Case No. VFA-0353, 26 DOE ¶ 80,240

December 19, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Information Focus on Energy

Date of Filing: November 20, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0353

On November 20, 1997, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received an Appeal filed by Information Focus on Energy (IFOE) from a determination that the Assistant Inspector General for Resource Management of the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (OIG) issued to it. The OIG issued this determination in response to a request for information that IFOE submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the OIG to conduct a further search for responsive materials.

I. Background

In its FOIA request, IFOE sought access to "the titles, report numbers, and issue dates of all DOE Inspector General Reports" for the years 1988 through 1996. In its initial response to this request, dated February 18, 1997, the OIG provided IFOE with a listing of all reports from this period that had previously been distributed to the public. IFOE appealed this response to the OHA, and in a Decision and Order dated April 17, 1997, the OHA remanded this matter to the OIG with instructions to search for and release all such reports, regardless of whether they had previously been made available to the public, or provide a detailed explanation for withholding such information. Information Focus on Energy, 26 DOE ¶ 80,179 (1997).

Upon remand, OIG conducted another search for responsive documents. Two additional documents were located. Document 1 is a listing of Office of Inspections reports for fiscal years 1987 through 1997. This document was released in its entirety. Document 2 is a listing of OIG cases closed during fiscal years 1988 through 1996. The OIG withheld portions of this document pursuant to 5 U.S.C. §§ 552(b)(6) and 552(b)(7)(C). It is this response that forms the basis for IFOE's current appeal.

In its submission, IFOE does not contest the OIG's withholding of portions of Document 2 under the FOIA. Instead, IFOE contends that the OIG's response is inadequate because it does not explain the contents of Document 2. Specifically, IFOE inquires as to the significance of the date at the top of this document and the meanings of the headings of the last three columns of information: "DATE CLOSED"; "REF TYPE"; and "REF DATE." In addition, IFOE contests the adequacy of the search for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of the OIG's Response

The FOIA does not require that an agency explain the contents of the documents that it releases. See, e.g., NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 162 (1975) (FOIA does not require agency to produce explanatory materials); Hudgins v. IRS, 620 F. Supp. 19, 21 (D.D.C. 1985) (The "FOIA creates only a right of access to records, not a right to personal services."). However, as a courtesy to IFOE, we contacted OIG to ascertain the answers to the questions posed in IFOE's appeal.(1) We were informed that the "DATE CLOSED" column of Document 2 sets forth the date that each case was closed; that the "REF TYPE" column refers to whether the case was resolved through administrative or judicial means; and that the "REF DATE" column sets forth the date that each case was placed on an administrative or judicial resolution track. In addition, the "Tue Jun 24" heading refers to the date that Document 2 was created. See memorandum of December 15, 1997 telephone conversation between Mr. Palmer and Jenise Fonville-Noels, OIG.

B. Adequacy of the Search

The FOIA requires that an agency "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. The fact that the results of a search may not meet with the requester's expectations does not necessarily mean that the search was inadequate. Robert Hale, 25 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,501 (1995). Instead, in evaluating the adequacy of a search, our inquiry generally focuses on the scope of the search that was performed. See, e.g., Richard J. Levernier, 25 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1995).

During our communications with the OIG, we also inquired as to the scope of that Office's search for responsive documents. We were informed that the OIG's computerized records system was searched, and that it is unlikely that additional responsive documents exist outside of that system. See December 16 memorandum.

In its appeal, IFOE contends that the search was inadequate because, although Document 2 purportedly lists all OIG cases that were closed during fiscal years 1988 through 1996, there are no entries in the "DATE CLOSED" column for the years 1988 through 1990. According to IFOE, this implies the existence of OIG reports during those years that are not included in the information provided to IFOE.

This contention is without merit. As an initial matter, Document 2 is a listing of cases closed during fiscal years 1988 through 1996, not a listing of OIG reports during that period. Most of these cases were closed without the issuance of a report. See December 16 memorandum. Moreover, Document 1 lists 39 OIG reports generated during the years 1988 through 1990. There is no indication in the record that additional OIG reports from those years exist. (2) We therefore reject IFOE's claim that the OIG's search for responsive documents was inadequate. We will accordingly deny IFOE's appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Information Focus on Energy on November 20, 1997 is hereby denied.

(1)The OIG attempted, without success, to contact IFOE to answer these questions. See memorandum of December 16 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Pam Langer, OIG Attorney (December 16 memorandum).

(2)Because of the OIG's record retention policies, cases that were closed during these years are not included in the OIG's database.

Case No. VFA-0355, 26 DOE ¶ 80,241

December 22, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Homesteaders Association of the Pajarito Plateau

Date of Filing: November 21, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0355

On November 21, 1997, the Appellant, the Homesteaders Association of the Pajarito Plateau, filed an Appeal from a final determination issued by the Albuquerque Operations Office (AO) of the Department of Energy (DOE) on October 20, 1997. In its determination, AO partially granted a request for information that the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its request for information dated January 30, 1997 (Request), the Appellant sought records relating to five categories of information pertaining to various DOE transfer of lands to public entities in New Mexico and the legal rationale behind such transfers. (1) In a determination letter dated October 20, 1997 (Determination Letter), AO provided the Appellant with copies of 25 documents in their entirety. AO also identified six other responsive documents. AO provided the Appellant with a redacted copy of one of the six documents but withheld the other five in their entirety. AO stated that the material withheld in each of the six documents was withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. AO asserted that the information withheld in the six documents consisted of predecisional personal opinions and recommendations. Release of such opinions could, AO believed, stifle open communications between decision makers and their advisors. AO further informed the Appellant that it had transferred to DOE Headquarters the Appellant's request regarding one of the categories of requested documents (Category 5).

Additionally, the Determination Letter provided a specific response to a question posed in the text of Category 3 of the Appellant's Request. Category 3 of the Request stated:

Because there are so many parcels of land that are already developed either by the County or by commercial developers in years past, why were none of the original homesteaders/legal heirs ever contacted if the DOE was involved in either the sale or transfer of such land. Some of these properties include the rifle range, the golf course, and other parcels of land? [sic] Please answer this question and provide the legal basis (Documents) under which these parcels of land were transferred to the county or sold to private developers/individuals.

Determination Letter at 1. With regard to Category 3, the Determination Letter stated that while the FOIA did not require agencies to answer questions, AO had asked the Los Alamos Area Office (LAAO) to respond to the question posed in Category 3. The Determination Letter went on to state that LAAO had informed AO that "they [LAAO] believe that in previous responses to you provided in meetings with Mr. Todd, the LAAO Manager, and in responses to your letters to Mr. Todd, Senator Domenici, Secretary Peña, and President Clinton, they have answered your questions in this regard."

In its Appeal, the Appellant argues that AO did not conduct an adequate search for responsive documents. Specifically, the Appellant asserts that the Determination did not provide a response to Category 2 of the Request. Category 2 specifically asked for documents "that the DOE relied upon that apparently made it legal for the DOE to give land back to the Pueblo of San Ildefonso." The Appellant further asserts that he was not provided with any of the documents referred to in the LAAO response to the question contained in Category 3. The Appellant also challenges the application of Exemption 5 to the withheld material and argues that AO should have attempted to segregate releasable material from the documents withheld in their entirety.

II. Adequacy of Search

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

To examine the adequacy of the search which was conducted for documents responsive to Category 2 of the Request we contacted the FOIA Officer at AO. We were referred to an official at LAAO, the field office most likely to possess responsive documents. The official informed us that there had been no transfer of land to the Pueblo of San Ildefonso. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Lisa Cummings, Office of General Counsel, LAAO, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (December 5, 1997). Consequently, no search was undertaken since documents would not exist. Given that LAAO determined that there had not been a transfer of land to the Pueblo of San Ildefonso and that consequently, no documents relating to such a transfer existed, we believe that the search conducted was adequate.

With regard to the search for documents pertaining to Category 3, AO informed us that LAAO was the field office most likely to contain responsive material. An official at LAAO informed us that documents responsive to Exemption 3 may exist. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Lisa Cummings, Office of General Counsel, LAAO and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (December 5, 1997). Consequently, we will remand this matter to AO so that it may coordinate another search for documents responsive to Category 3 of the Appellant's request.

III. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The six documents at issue in this case are listed in Appendix A. After reviewing each document, we have determined, as more fully explained below, that five of the documents have certain additional segregable information which could be released to the Appellant. On remand, AO should release this material to the Appellant or issue another determination explaining why the material is being withheld. With regard to Document 2, because much of Document 2, a draft land utilization plan, did not originate within the agency, the Exemption 5 issues are distinct and require special treatment. Consequently, we find that AO should issue another determination specifically regarding the applicability of Exemption 5 or other exemptions to that document.

A. Document 1

Document 1 consists of a memorandum from a DOE official to various other DOE officials along with six attachments (Enclosures 1 and 2 and Tabs A, B, C and D). AO provided the Appellant with a redacted version of the memorandum and identified two of the attachments (Enclosures 1 and 2) as non-responsive to the Appellant's Request. (2) AO also identified three attachments which were withheld in their entirety. However, AO has informed us that it inadvertently stated in the Determination Letter that there were only three instead of four attachments which were withheld in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. AO also informed us that it had in fact reviewed all four remaining attachments and had decided to withhold all four in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Elva Barfield, FOIA Officer, AO, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (December 9, 1997).

The memorandum in Document 1 contains analysis and recommendations regarding DOE's possible divestment of the Los Alamos Airport. The redacted portions of the memo contain specific recommendations regarding possible disposition of the Airport. The deleted portions are predecisonal and deliberative material concerning DOE options regarding the Los Alamos Airport. Consequently, we believe that Exemption 5 was properly applied to the redacted portions of the memorandum.

Tab A to Document 1 consists of a proposed departmental position regarding an OIG report on AO's compliance with aviation safety orders, standards and regulations along with general management and accounting for the AO air services program. After reviewing this material, we do not find it to be responsive to the Appellant's Request since it consists of a proposed departmental response to the OIG report and does not deal with any land transfer issues. Given that this document is non- responsive to the Appellant's Request, we need not consider whether the document could be withheld pursuant to Exemption 5.

Tab B consists of a memorandum outlining various issues regarding the possible transfer of the Los Alamos Airport to the County of Los Alamos. The documents outlines various arguments for and against the transfer of the property and as such is a predecisional and deliberative document. While almost all of the information contained in Tab B was properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 5, there is a small amount of non-deliberative information consisting of headings and titles and some segregable factual information which can be released to the Appellant. Specifically, the first paragraph on the first page of the memo as well as the signature block on page 3 and all material below it contains segregable factual information which can be provided to the Appellant.

Tab C consists of a one-page memorandum concerning the possible transfer of the Los Alamos Airport. The memorandum provides a brief history of events leading up to the DOE's decision to start consideration of the possibility of transferring land to the County of Los Alamos along with a brief summary regarding recommended options for land transfers. While the portion of the memorandum describing recommendations is predecisional and deliberative, much of the memorandum consists of segregable factual material. Specifically, the second and third paragraphs of the memorandum consists of segregable factual material which could be provided to the Appellant along with various headings and titles on the page and the signature block and the material below the signature block.

Tab D consists of two copies (on different types of paper) of a memorandum regarding the proposed transfer of the Los Alamos Airport to Los Alamos County along with a copies of documents in Tabs B and C. The vast majority of the material in the memorandum itself consists of various considerations and recommendations regarding a possible transfer of the Los Alamos Airport. This material is predecisonal and deliberative and thus properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. There is a small amount of segregable non-deliberative material consisting of most of the titles and headings which can be released. Additionally, the first paragraph on the first page of the memo appears to consists of segregable factual material which can be released to the Appellant.

B. Document 2

Document 2 consists of a one-page handwritten note to a DOE official with an attached letter from a Los Alamos County official (Los Alamos Letter) and a draft land utilization plan for DOE property created by Los Alamos County. The initial question arising from the application of Exemption 5 to this document is whether the portion of the document consisting of the Los Alamos Letter and a draft land utilization plan drafted by Los Alamos County can be considered an "inter-agency or intra- agency" document. Clearly the Los Alamos Letter and the draft land utilization plan were not created by a federal agency. However, courts have extended Exemption 5 protection for documents created outside of federal agencies under certain circumstances. In this regard, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia Circuit has held that "Exemption 5 permits an agency to protect the confidentiality of communications outside the agency so long as those communications are part and parcel of the agency's deliberative process. As such they remain intra-agency documents." Dow Jones & Co., Inc. v. Dep't of Justice, 917 F. 2d 571, 575 (D.C. Cir. 1990). Consequently, in light of the fact that the Los Alamos Letter and the draft land utilization plan were created outside of a federal governmental agency, we must specifically examine the role Document 2 played in DOE deliberations in order to determine whether it can appropriately be deemed an "intra-agency" document for Exemption 5 purposes. However, the Determination Letter does not provided any indication as to the role Document 2 played in the DOE's deliberative process other than a generalized assertion that the document sets forth "personal opinions and recommendations of the authors and are antecedent to the adoption of agency policy." Given the unique non-agency origin of most of the withheld material in Document 2 and to afford the Appellant an opportunity to formulate an effective appeal, we will remand this matter back to AO so it can issue another determination to address the considerations discussed above and to explain why Document 2 should be withheld under Exemption 5 and/or another exemption. Additionally, on remand AO should consider if any of the material in Document 2 can be segregated from withholdable material and provided to the Appellant. (3)

Document 3 is a copy of a memorandum to the Assistant Manager for Projects and Facility Modernization with attached comments concerning the potential sale or donation of land to the Los Alamos County. The majority of the document consists of opinions and analysis of issues concerning the potential transfer of land to Los Alamos County. It contains recommendations as to steps the DOE should take if the decision is to be made to transfer property to the County. The document is predecisonal and deliberative. Thus, the majority of the material in this document was properly protected pursuant to Exemption 5. However, there is a small amount of segregable factual material which could be released to the Appellant. Specifically, the headings and titles on the first page of the memorandum are not deliberative material and should be released. Additionally, the first paragraph and the first sentence of the second paragraph of page one of the memorandum consist of segregable factual material which should be released to the Appellant. Additionally the entire second page of the memorandum consists of segregable factual material which should be released. Lastly the top two title lines on the first page of the attachment are non-deliberative material that should also be released to the Appellant.

Document 4 is a memorandum that outlines the specific land tracts which DOE would propose to offer to Los Alamos County along with an assessment of Los Alamos County's expected response to the offer. This document therefore is predecisonal and deliberative since it outlines DOE's negotiating position vis-a-vis Los Alamos County. While most of the material in this document is properly protected by Exemption 5, there is some segregable factual material. Specifically, the titles and headings along with the first paragraph on the first page of the memo should be released. The title and headings on page two and the signature block and the "cc" block are segregable factual material and should also be released.

E. Document 5

Document 5 consists of a memorandum with an attached draft lease agreement between the County of Los Alamos and the DOE. The vast majority of this predecisional document, such as the draft lease agreement itself, consists of predecisional, deliberative material. However, there is a small amount of non-deliberative or segregable factual material. The headings and titles on the memorandum page (first page of the document) are segregable factual material and should be released. Further, the first two sentences of the first paragraph of the memorandum page consist of segregable factual material which should also be released. In addition, the signature block and all material below the signature block on the memorandum page consists of segregable factual material which should also be released to the Appellant.

F. Document 6

Document 6 consists of a copy of a one-page letter sent to the Director of Real Estate at the University of New Mexico with an attached draft letter of intent to transfer a parcel of land from the DOE to the University of New Mexico. The entire draft letter of intent is deliberative and predecisonal and thus was properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. However, the one-page letter contains no deliberative material and is in itself not predecisional. Consequently, in the absence of further justification, Exemption 5 does not apply to the one-page letter. On remand, AO should either release the one-page letter portion of Document 6 or issue another determination explaining why the document is being withheld.

G. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that AO properly applied Exemption 5 to most of the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless demands disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. In the present case, the requested information consists of the opinions of individuals concerning different aspects of DOE decisions regarding the possible transfer of DOE property to the County of Los Alamos. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of employees and managers to make candid statements of opinion. Employees and managers would be less likely to communicate their opinions if they knew or suspected that an agency would release their opinions to the public. Consequently, we find that the existence of this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the material protected pursuant to Exemption 5 contained in the requested documents would not be in the public interest.

III. Summary

As discussed above, we will remand this matter to AO so that another search may be conducted for documents responsive to Category 3 of the Appellant's Request. Additionally, we will remand this matter to AO so that it may release the material described above concerning Documents 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 or issue another determination explaining why the material should be withheld. Consequently, the Appellant's Appeal will be granted in part. (4)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Homesteaders Association of the Pajarito Plateau on November 21, 1997, Case No. VFA-0355 is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2), and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0356, 27 DOE ¶ 80,102

January 8, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: K&M Plastics, Inc.

Date of Filing: December 9, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0356

On December 9, 1997, K&M Plastics, Inc. (K&M) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Rocky Flats Field Office (RFFO) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to it on November 13, 1997. That determination denied a request for information that K&M submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require RFFO to release the requested information.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the type of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is permitted by federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On July 30, 1997, K&M filed a request under the FOIA in which it sought "a copy of the bid abstract for Kaiser-Hill Company, L.L.C., Rocky Flats Environmental Tech. Site, Golden, Colorado, Solicitation No. DC 706517 CE dated June 19, 1997." This FOIA request was initially filed with the DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office (AO). AO informed K&M that the requested records were at RFFO, and transferred the request to RFFO for processing. Letter from FOI Officer, AO, to K&M (August 5, 1997). RFFO issued a determination to K&M on November 13, 1997. In that determination, RFFO found that the records sought by K&M were not "agency records" because they were not in the possession and control of the agency at the time of the FOIA request. RFFO further explained that under the terms of the contract between DOE and Kaiser-Hill, the procurement records requested are the property of the contractor and therefore not subject to release under DOE regulations. Letter from Mary Hammack, FOIA Officer, RFFO, to C. Poellet, President, K&M (November 13, 1997) (Determination Letter).

In its Appeal, K&M argues that the records should be made public because they do not affect national security or public safety. In addition, K&M further alleges that it requested similar information in the past, (1) and that this request was honored. See Letter from C. Poellet, President, K&M, to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (December 9, 1997) (Appeal Letter).

II. Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether procurement records of a DOE contractor which were in the possession of the DOE contractor at the time of the request are subject to the FOIA. Contrary to K&M's assertion, the FOIA does not direct that all records that do not affect national security or public safety are subject to disclosure. Rather, we must first determine whether the requested records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). Records that do not meet these criteria may nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations if they are owned by the government. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information required to be made available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-stage analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as Kaiser-Hill, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., The Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,205 (1997); Diane C. Larson; 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 (1996); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA, and if not (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

A. Kaiser Hill Is Not An Agency Under The FOIA

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether an entity should be regarded as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case which involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, Kaiser-Hill is the prime contractor responsible for maintaining and operating the Rocky Flats Environmental Technology Site. This Office has frequently held that DOE management and operating contractors are not "agencies" for FOIA purposes. See, e.g., The Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,205 (1997) (Fluor Daniel Fernald); Diane C. Larson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 (1996) (Westinghouse Hanford Company); William Kuntz III, 25 DOE ¶ 80,157 (1995) (Lockeed Martin Corporation). We have previously determined that the DOE has obtained Kaiser-Hill's services and exercises general control over the contract work, but it does not supervise Kaiser-Hill's day-to-day operations. See ChemData, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,228 (1997). Therefore, Kaiser-Hill does not meet the test set forth in the Orleans and Forsham decisions, and we find that Kaiser-Hill is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

B. The Records Were Not Within DOE's Control

Although Kaiser-Hill is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, records in its possession which are responsive to K&M's request could be deemed "agency records" if they were obtained by the DOE and were within the DOE's control at the time the FOIA request was made. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989) (Tax Analysts); see also Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. However in this case, the documents in question had not been obtained by the DOE and were not in the agency's possession at the time of K&M's request. See Determination Letter.

C. Procurement Records Are The Property Of The Contractor

Even if a contractor-acquired record fails to qualify as an "agency record," it may still be subject to voluntary release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations state that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

We therefore look next to the contract between DOE and Kaiser-Hill to determine the status of the withheld records. That contract states:

Except as is provided in paragraph (b) of this clause, all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government and shall be delivered to the Government . . . .

Contract DE-AC34-95RF00825, Section H.4. Paragraph (b) excludes from this provision "[r]ecords related to any procurement action by the Contractor." Id. at Clause H.20(b)(8). Thus, because procurement records are not among the records which are property of the Government under the DOE's contract with Kaiser-Hill, these records are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the records sought by K&M are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA, nor subject to release under DOE regulations. Accordingly, the Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by K&M Plastics, Inc. on December 9, 1997, Case Number VFA-0356, is hereby denied.

(1)Prior to 1995, RFFO released bid abstracts on request because that information was considered government property. However, in 1995 Kaiser-Hill became the prime contractor responsible for the Rocky Flats Environmental Technology Site, and pursuant to the contract between DOE and Kaiser-Hill, those records became the property of the contractor. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Mary Hammack and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (January 5, 1998).

December 22, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: The Rural Alliance for Military Accountability

Date of Filing: November 28, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0357

On November 25, 1997, the Rural Alliance for Military Accountability (RAMA) submitted an Appeal from a determination issued to it on October 31, 1997 by the Rocky Flats Field Office (RF) of the Department of Energy (DOE). (1) That determination concerned a request for information submitted by RAMA pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, RF would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

In a September 22, 1996 Freedom of Information Act request (Request), RAMA asked for copies of all documents pertaining to the transportation routes DOE and its contractors utilize to transport materials and wastes from the DOE's Rocky Flats facility in Colorado to the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. RAMA specified that it sought, among other items, maps, records of decisions, National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) documentation, risk analysis documentation, accident procedures, emergency preparedness training materials and all written policies pertaining to the transportation of materials or wastes.

On October 31, 1997, RF issued a partial determination letter (Determination Letter) responding to RAMA's Request. The Determination Letter listed a number of documents it released in their entirety to the Appellant. Included in these documents were copies of maps with approved hazardous material transportation routes for the State of Colorado. The Determination Letter stated that no copies of any approved hazardous material transportation routes for the State of New Mexico were found but RAMA was informed that the New Mexico Highway Department may possess such information.

In its Appeal, RAMA argues that RF conducted an inadequate search for documents responsive to its Request. Specifically, RAMA asserts that the partial response provided by RF was "unresponsive and contradictory in the information provided." As evidence of the inadequacy of RF's response, RAMA asserts that it is inconceivable that a federal agency would not have a map of approved hazardous material routes for the State of New Mexico. (2)

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., National Resources Defense Council, 26 DOE ¶ 80,229 (1997).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted RF to ascertain the extent of the search that it performed for responsive documents. RF informed us that it conducted a search in the RF offices most likely to contain responsive documents. These offices included the offices of the various Assistant Managers for Government Operations, Environmental Compliance, Material Stabilization and Disposition, Program and Program Planning Integration and Performance Assessment. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Mary Hammack, FOIA Officer, RF, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (December 10, 1997). Additionally, RF asked Kaiser-Hill Company, the main integrator contractor, to conduct a search. Kaiser-Hill Company determined that DynCorp, the contractor with responsibility for the shipment of hazardous materials and training of personnel, would most likely possess responsive documents. Kaiser-Hill subsequently requested that the offices of DynCorp be searched. In light of the above facts, we believe RF conducted a search of the DOE and contractor offices which would most likely contain responsive documents. The fact that RF did not possess a map of approved transportation routes in New Mexico does not convince us otherwise. The traffic manager for DynCorp informed us each state is responsible for determining the routes by which hazardous materials are shipped but that states need not actually select routes or print maps of such routes. He also informed us that to the best of his knowledge RF has never sought to obtain a map of New Mexico State hazardous material routes or to determine whether the State of New Mexico had ever created a map or list of such routes. Further, he informed us that to transporting hazardous materials, RF would contract with a carrier and that the carrier is responsible for selecting an appropriate route. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Mary Hammock, FOIA Officer, RF, Len Lenarcic, traffic manager, DynCorp, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (December 17, 1997). We were also informed that the DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office, which supervises the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant in Carlsbad, New Mexico, would be the DOE facility which would most likely possess a map or list of approved New Mexico hazardous material transportation routes, if such documents exist, and that RAMA's requested has been forwarded to that office. Id. Since we believe that RF conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents, we find that RF conducted an adequate search pursuant to the FOIA. Consequently, we must deny RAMA's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on November 28, 1997 by the Rural Alliance for Military Accountability, Case No. VFA-0357, is hereby denied.

George B. Breznay

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: December 22, 1997

(1)RAMA's initial submission did not include a copy of the determination letter it was appealing and which is required to be by DOE's FOIA regulations. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(b). We deemed RAMA's appeal as filed as of the date when we received a copy of the RF determination letter on November 28, 1997.

(2)In its Appeal, RAMA also complains about the length of time RF took to process its FOIA Request and about an incident involving a RF official. We can address neither of these complaints. Our jurisdiction is limited to appeals of actions whereby an Authorizing Official has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to a request or when a FOIA Officer has denied a request for a waiver of fees. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a).

December 29, 1997

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Dykema Gossett, PLLC

Date of Filing: November 26, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0358

On November 26, 1997, the law firm of Dykema Gossett (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on November 3, 1997 by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge). The Appellant had requested these documents under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its determination, Oak Ridge withheld numerous requested documents, either partially or in their entirety, under FOIA Exemption 4. This Appeal contends that Oak Ridge's withholdings under Exemption 4 were improper. In addition, the Appellant also questions the adequacy of the search for documents responsive to his request that Oak Ridge conducted. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld documents and to conduct an additional search for responsive documents.

I. BACKGROUND

On June 26, 1996, the Appellant submitted an extensive request to Oak Ridge for information relating to the Superconducting Super Collider Laboratory (SSCL). This request was in turn composed of 14 sub-requests. On October 6, 1997, Oak Ridge released a number of responsive documents to the Appellant. Accompanying this release was a letter from Oak Ridge's FOIA Officer informing the Appellant that additional responses would be forthcoming. (1) On November 3, 1997, Oak Ridge issued a determination letter informing the Appellant:

This letter and enclosures complete our review of agency documents located in the U.S. Department of Energy (DOE) and contractor files of the Superconducting Super Collider Laboratory found responsive to your request . . . . Enclosed are amendments to contract SSC-91-B-01701 and SSC-91-B-01707, as well as additional records with deletions of commercial, financial information, settlement sensitive data, and trade secret information in accordance with 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4).

November 3, 1997 Determination Letter at 1.

On November 26, 1997, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that Oak Ridge's search for responsive documents was inadequate and that Oak Ridge had not sufficiently justified its withholdings under Exemption 4.

II. ANALYSIS

A. Adequacy of the Search

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). We review the adequacy of an agency's search under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

After conducting a search for responsive documents under the FOIA, the statute requires that the agency provide the requester with a written determination notifying the requester of the results of that search and, if applicable, of the agency's intentions to withhold any of the responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). The statute further requires that the agency provide the requester with an opportunity to appeal any adverse determination. Id.

The written determination letter serves to inform the requester of the results of the agency's search for responsive documents and of any withholdings that the agency intends to make. In doing so, the determination letter allows the requester to decide whether the agency's response to its request was adequate and proper and provides this office with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal.

It therefore follows that the agency has an obligation to ensure that its determination letters: (1) adequately describe the results of searches; (2) clearly indicate which information was withheld, and (3) specify the exemption(s) under which information was withheld. Research Information Services, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,139 (1996) (RIS); Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,205 at 80,767 (1996). Without an adequately informative determination letter, the requester and the review authority must speculate about the appropriateness of the agency's determinations. Id.

While the determination letter issued to the Appellant generally indicates that responsive information was withheld under Exemption 4, the determination letter does not identify the specific information it is withholding under Exemption 4. As a result, the determination letter does not satisfy DOE's obligation under the applicable FOIA case law.

The Appellant contends that it has not received any documents from at least nine of the 14 subcategories in its FOIA request. Since the determination letter does not explain why no responsive documents were located for these nine subcategories, it is unclear whether documents responsive to these nine subcategories were identified and withheld under Exemption 4 or were never located at all.

We are therefore remanding this matter to Oak Ridge for clarification. On remand, Oak Ridge should issue a new determination letter in which it identifies each document responsive to the June 26, 1996 request, indicates whether any responsive document (or portion thereof) has been withheld, and justifies any withholding.

B. Exemption 4

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemption 4 is at issue in the present case.

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. §

1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks).

In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993). It is well settled that information required to be submitted in order to obtain a DOE contract is considered to be submitted on a non-voluntarily basis for Exemption 4 purposes. See, e.g., Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993). The federal courts have reasoned that even though such submissions are voluntary in the sense that no company is forced to do business with the government, information required by the terms of a Request for Proposal must be submitted if “contractors want to win lucrative government contracts . . .” McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. NASA, No. 91-3134, slip op. (D.D.C. June 30, 1995). Since the information was submitted to the DOE specifically for the purpose of acquiring a contract, it was clearly involuntarily submitted. See Industrial Constructors Corporation, 25 DOE ¶ 80,196 (1996) (Industrial). Since the information was submitted involuntarily, it is only "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

In the present case, the Appellant contends that Oak Ridge failed to adequately explain why it concluded that release of the withheld information could reasonably be expected to cause substantial competitive harm.

Both the FOIA and the DOE regulations implementing it require reasonably specific justifications for the withholding of documents or portions of documents. Mead Data Central, Inc. v. United States Dep't of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Kleppe, 547 F.2d 673 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Data Technology Industries, 4 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1979). Conclusory and generalized claims by agency officials that material is exempt from disclosure are not acceptable. Thus, an agency determination that material should be withheld under Exemption 4 because its disclosure is likely to cause substantial competitive harm must include the reasons for believing that such harm will result to the competitive position of the person from whom the information is obtained. Federal Information Tools, 3 DOE ¶ 80,163 at 80,807 (1979). An adequate explanation would, for example, indicate the type of competitive injury which would result from disclosure, and the manner in which the information, if disclosed, could be utilized by a competitor to damage the firm's market position. Exxon Co., U.S.A., 8 DOE ¶ 80,162 at 80,794-95 (1981).

Oak Ridge’s determination letter does not meet these standards. The determination letter does not contain a sufficient explanation of why Oak Ridge determined that release of the information it is withholding would cause competitive harm to the information’s submitters. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to Oak Ridge with instructions to issue a new determination letter. The new determination letter should specifically identify all information that the agency is withholding under Exemption 4. The determination letter should also explain why release of each document (or portion thereof) could reasonably be expected to cause competitive harm to the submitters if released. (2)

III. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, we are remanding this matter to the Oak Ridge Operations Office with instructions to promptly issue a new determination letter that complies with the requirements discussed above.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Dykema Gossett, PLLC on November 26, 1997 (Case Number VFA-0358) is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Oak Ridge Operations Office for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

(1) On October 20, 1997, Oak Ridge issued another partial response to the June 26, 1996 request releasing more responsive documents to the Appellant. However, Oak Ridge withheld several portions of these documents under Exemption 4. In a previous appeal, VFA-0349, the Appellant contested Oak Ridge's withholding of one of these documents, entitled "Part III Prime Item Development Specification" (Part III), which was withheld in its entirety. Dykema Gossett PLLC, 27 DOE ¶ 80,__ (December 11, 1997).

(2) The DOE regulations direct the DOE to release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. However, in cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we also do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

January 5, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Motion for Reconsideration

Name of Petitioner:James R. Hutton

Date of Filing: December 3, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0359

On December 3, 1997, James R. Hutton (the Appellant) filed a Motion for Reconsideration of a Decision and Order issued by the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) on November 13, 1997. James R. Hutton, Case No. VFA-0341. For the reasons detailed below, we deny the Appellant's request that we reconsider our ruling that the names and position numbers of federal employees listed on a "retention register" are exempt from disclosure under Exemption 6 of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. §552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. §1004.10(b)(6).

Background

On September 9, 1997, the Appellant submitted a FOIA request to the Oak Ridge Operations Office of the DOE (Oak Ridge) seeking a copy of a retention register prepared in anticipation of a "reduction in force" (RIF).(1) On September 23, 1997, in response to the Appellant's FOIA request, Oak Ridge issued a determination in which it withheld the entire retention register on the grounds that disclosure of this document "would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" under Exemption 6 of the FOIA.

On October 14, 1997, the Appellant filed an appeal of this determination with OHA. On November 13, 1997, we issued a Decision and Order that remanded the case to Oak Ridge with instructions to redact the names and position numbers of the listed employees, and release the retention register to the Appellant. We ordered the redaction of data that identified the listed employees to avoid a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy under Exemption 6.

On December 3, 1997, the Appellant filed the instant Motion seeking reconsideration of the Decision and Order issued on November 13, 1997. In this Motion, the Appellant contends that federal employees have no privacy interest in the disclosure of the details of their federal employment because this information is generally available to the public.(2) He further disputes that the listed employees have a privacy interest in their names in the context of the retention register because this document does not directly identify the employees who will be terminated, but only ranks and categorizes these employees. The Appellant further claims that the redacted information should be disclosed because employees have a "particularized need" to know how they are ranked in relation to others, and whether the agency is conducting the reduction in force in accordance with law.

Analysis

As detailed below, we will deny the Appellant's Motion for Reconsideration because he has failed to present evidence that we committed error by ruling that the names and position numbers of federal employees listed on a retention register are exempt from disclosure under Exemption 6 of the FOIA. (3)

As we indicated in our initial Decision, the purpose of Exemption 6 is to protect individuals from clearly unwarranted invasions of their personal privacy. To determine whether a record may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. See James R. Hutton, Case No. VFA-0341 (Nov. 13, 1997).

The Privacy Interest

After considering Appellant's arguments, we reaffirm our previous ruling that an employee has a privacy interest in his or her name and position number in the context of a retention register because the disclosure of this information might suggest the employee's vulnerability to a reduction in force.

We agree with the Appellant that a federal employee often has no privacy interest in his or her name or status as a federal employee. However, the Appellant has failed to recognize that a federal employee does have a privacy interest in his or her name when it is linked to personally sensitive information. See The Cincinnati Enquirer, 25 DOE ¶ 80,206 at 80,768-69 (1996); William H. Payne, 25 DOE ¶ 80,190 at 80,726-27 (1996); The News Tribune, 25 DOE ¶ 80,181 at 80,699-700 (1996). See also Raymond T. Number & Patricia Ann Krauthaus, Information as a Commodity: New Imperatives of Commercial Law, 55 Law & Contemp. Probs., Spring 1992, at 103, 124 (under FOIA law, a person has an interest in "information about himself if the information is personally sensitive, if it is private, and if it is to be used or disclosed in a form related specifically to the individual.").

An individual's vulnerability to a reduction in force is sensitive information. Disclosure of this information may cause the individual to suffer embarrassment and financial harm. As such, a federal employee has a privacy interest in the disclosure of such information. See Rosenfeld v. HHS, 3 Gov't Disclosure Serv. (P-H) ¶ 83,082 at 83,617 (D.D.C. Jan. 31, 1983), aff'd on other grounds, No. 83-1341 (D.C. Cir. Nov. 11, 1983) (employee has privacy interest in disclosure of name on proposed reduction in force list); National Ass'n of Retired Fed. Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (federal annuitant has privacy interest in disclosure of status and receipt of pension); Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Usery, 426 F. Supp. 150, 168-169 (D.D.C. 1976), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. National Org. for Women v. Social Sec. Admin., 736 F.2d 727 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (employee has privacy interest in disclosure of promotion prospects and reasons for termination).

The Public Interest in Disclosure

The Appellant has also failed to convince us that we committed error by ruling that the public interest in the disclosure of the names and position numbers of the employees listed in the retention register was insubstantial or nonexistent.

The Appellant's contention that other employees have a "particularized need to know" this information ignores the holding of the Supreme Court in Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749 (1989) (Reporters Committee). In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that the public interest standard must be used in the balancing test to determine whether the disclosure of documents would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy under the FOIA. The Court indicated that information advances the public interest only if the information is likely to contribute "significantly to public understanding of the operations of the government." Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 775 (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii)). See also Department of Defense v.

Federal Labor Relations Auth., 510 U.S. 487, 494-95 (1994). The Court also held that the requester's personal interest is irrelevant in determining whether documents should be released under the FOIA. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 775.

Here Appellant has failed to demonstrate the existence of a significant public interest in the disclosure of the names of the employees. He claims that the names of the employees are needed to determine whether the agency is conducting the reduction in force in accordance with law. However, as we have noted in other situations, the release of names tells nothing about the operations and activities of government. See Michael A. Grosche, 26 DOE ¶ 80,146 at 80,644 (1996). Thus, here we find that both the public and privacy analyses support withholding the names of the employees listed on the retention register.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Motion for Reconsideration filed by James R. Hutton on December 3, 1997, Case Number VFA-0359, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The retention register contains information that permits the reader to rank each named employee in terms of his or her vulnerability to a reduction in force. It contains the names and position numbers of employees who are subject to a reduction in force, and sets forth, amongst other things, information concerning the employee's tenure, job classification series, and performance appraisal.

(2)The Appellant concedes that an employee has a privacy interest in his or her performance evaluation, and has indicated that he has no objection to the non- disclosure of such information.

(3)The DOE regulations governing FOIA requests and appeals do not contain a provision that permits a party to move for reconsideration of an appellate decision issued by OHA. 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Nevertheless, based on 10 C.F.R.§1003.55(b)(1), we have, on occasion, reconsidered FOIA decisions based on significantly changed circumstances. Moreover, we have also reconsidered FOIA decisions when a party has provided specific, convincing evidence of error. See Robert Condra, 22 DOE ¶80,141 (1992); Chuck Hansen, 18 DOE ¶ 80,116 (1988).

January 23, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Ruth Towle Murphy

Date of Filing: December 22, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0360

On December 22, 1997, Ruth Towle Murphy completed the filing of an Appeal from a determination the Manager of the Oak Ridge Operations Office (Manager) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to her on November 14, 1997. In that determination, the Manager partially granted a request for information that Ms. Murphy filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In her request for information, Ms. Murphy sought a copy of the contract designated DE-AC05-95MA40110 and any modifications to that contract. In his determination, the Manager released a copy of the requested contract, but deleted “estimated costs, fixed fees, and names of key personnel in accordance with 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4).” Ms. Murphy contends that “only information obtained from an individual, a partnership, or a corporation, other than a government agency, qualifies under the fourth exemption” of the FOIA (emphasis in original). She argues that since both the DOE and the submitter signed the contract she seeks, in essence, the DOE obtained the contract from itself. Since Exemption 4 does not apply to documents obtained from a government agency, Ms. Murphy contends that the Manager improperly applied Exemption 4.

Analysis

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provides to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In choosing between these two tests, we have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposals. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Glen M. Jameson, 25 DOE ¶ 80,191 (1996) (Jameson); Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

Ms. Murphy is incorrect when she argues that the DOE obtained the withheld information from itself. Simply because the DOE signed the contract is no indication that the DOE had anything to do with the creation of the information. In fact, the submitter, NCI Information Systems, Inc., created and provided the redacted information to the DOE voluntarily for the purpose of acquiring a contract. See Industrial Constructors Corporation, 25 DOE ¶ 80,196 (1996) (Industrial); Tri-City Herald, 16 DOE ¶ 80,114 (1987).

We have carefully reviewed the redacted information and have confirmed that the DOE withheld only estimated costs, fixed fees, and the names of key personnel to implement the contract. We find that all of the redacted information is commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. The DOE obtained this material from a "person" as required by Exemption 4, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). We also conclude that each withheld item, the estimated costs, fixed fees, and the names of key personnel, is confidential because the release of any item would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. We have stated in the past that release of cost and financial information could be used by a competitor to undercut another firm's bids and thus effectively eliminate the disclosing firm from competition. See Industrial; International Technology Corporation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1992); U.S. Rentals, 21 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1991). In this case, for example, if the submitter released its estimated costs and fees for completing specific tasks, any competitor could easily determine how to adjust its own costs and fees to arrive at a lower contract price and plan to undercut the submitter's best price and procedures in a future bid process. Furthermore, if the DOE were to release the names of key personnel involved in the contract, a competitor could offer employment to these people in an effort to make his firm more competitive in a future bid process at the expense of the submitter. See Jameson. Accordingly, we must deny Ms. Murphy’s Appeal.

The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Ruth Towle Murphy on December 22, 1997, Case No. VFA-0360, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Charles G. Frazier

Date of Filing: December 29, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0361

On December 29, 1997,(1) Charles G. Frazier completed the filing of an Appeal from a determination issued to him on November 10, 1997, by the Chicago Operations Office (Chicago) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned a request for information submitted by Mr. Frazier pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be required to release a portion of the appointment books of certain Chicago employees.

I. Background

On October 16, 1997, Mr. Frazier submitted a Freedom of Information Act request to Chicago seeking copies of Cherri Langenfeld's and Tim Crawford's appointment books(2) reflecting all daily meetings for June 1997. Determination Letter dated November 10, 1997, from John P. Kennedy, Acting Manager, Chicago Operations Office, to Charles Frazier. In its November 10, 1997 Determination Letter, Chicago stated that the requested calendars constitute personal records and were not subject to the FOIA. Id.

Mr. Frazier appealed to this Office stating that he disagreed that the appointment calendars are personal records. He supports this claim by maintaining that Ms. Langenfeld's appointment book is still at Chicago although she no longer works for DOE. He challenges Chicago's assertion that Mr. Crawford's appointment book is personal in nature by declaring that Mr. Crawford's secretary maintained an appointment book for the predecessor in Mr. Crawford's position, Manager of Argonne Group. Appeal Letter from Charles G. Frazier to Director, OHA, DOE.

II. Analysis

The issue we must address is whether the appointment books requested by Mr. Frazier are "agency records." The FOIA requires the disclosure only of "records" maintained by "agencies" within the executive branch of the federal government. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). To support his claim that the requested information is an "agency record," Mr. Frazier relies on the following: (1) despite her departure from Chicago, Ms. Langenfeld's appointment book remains in the possession of her secretary, and (2) Mr. Crawford's secretary maintained an appointment book for his predecessor.

We are not convinced by these arguments. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has concluded that appointment calendars are not agency records. Bureau of National Affairs, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 742 F.2d 1484 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (BNA). In making its determination, the court relied on Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. For Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980) (Kissinger). In Kissinger, the Supreme Court focused on four factors to determine whether a document is an "agency record:" whether the documents were (1) in the agency's control; (2) generated within the agency; (3) placed into the agency's files; and (4) used by the agency "for any purpose." Kissinger, 445 U.S. at 157. The BNA court determined that the appointment calendars at issue were generated within the agency and prepared on government time, at government expense, and with government materials. BNA, 742 F.2d at 1494; see Kissinger, 445 U.S. at 157. The officials' secretaries maintained the appointment calendars as part of their official duties. BNA, 742 F.2d at 1494. The appointment calendars were not placed into agency files. Id. Also, the employees were permitted to discard the appointment calendars at their discretion. Id. at 1494-1495. After reviewing these factors, the BNA court determined that the appointment calendars at issue were not under agency control and had not been placed into the agency files, even though the calendars had been generated within the agency. Therefore, the first three factors listed in Kissinger were in conflict with each other. Thus, the court concluded that it should look at the fourth factor and analyze how the documents were used within the agency in question. Id. at 1495. If the appointment calendars were used by the agency for any purpose, they would be considered "agency records."

All the factors that were present in BNA are present here. Ms. Langenfeld's and Mr. Crawford's appointment books were generated within the agency and prepared on government time, at government expense, and with government materials. Similarly, Ms. Langenfeld's and Mr. Crawford's secretaries maintained the appointment books as part of their official duties. Neither Ms. Langenfeld's or Mr. Crawford's appointment books have been placed in the agency files, and Ms. Langenfeld and Mr. Crawford were permitted to discard the books at their discretion. As the BNA court was compelled to analyze the purpose of the appointment calendars because the first three factors listed in the Kissinger opinion conflicted with each other, we must determine how the appointment books were used at Chicago.

The BNA court concluded that the appointment calendars at issue there were not "agency records" because (1) they were not distributed to other employees, but were retained solely for the convenience of the individual officials and (2) they were created for the personal convenience of the individuals to organize both their personal and business appointments. BNA, 742 F.2d at 1496. Similarly, Ms. Langenfeld and Mr. Crawford used their appointment books to organize both their business and personal activities. The appointment books facilitated the performance of their official duties by allowing them to keep their lives in order. See id. at 1494. Ms. Langenfeld's book contained doctor and dentist appointments, along with both personal and business dinner engagements. Her business meetings and schedule were placed in the book as well. Similarly, Mr. Crawford's appointment book contained both personal and business engagements. Other than their secretaries, no one but Ms. Langenfeld and Mr. Crawford had access to the appointment books. Neither of the appointment books was distributed to other employees; each was strictly for the use of Ms. Langenfeld and Mr. Crawford and their secretaries. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Janet R. H. Fishman, Attorney-Examiner, OHA, and Kim McMahon, Attorney, Chicago, January 14, 1998. Therefore, as the BNA court determined, we must conclude that these appointment books were created and maintained for the personal convenience of Ms. Langenfeld and Mr. Crawford so they could organize both their personal and business appointments.

The fact that Ms. Langenfeld's calendar is still at Chicago does not change our determination. Ms. Langenfeld's appointment book was merely a personal convenience. The only reason Ms. Langenfeld's secretary has retained the book is to refresh her memory of Ms. Langenfeld's schedule on occasion. We do not believe this action is enough to bring it up to the level of an "agency record." At no time was the book in the agency's control or was it placed into the agency's files. Further, we do not find the fact that Mr. Crawford's secretary kept his predecessor's appointment book convincing. The court in BNA found that even though the officials' secretaries maintained the appointment calendars, the books were maintained for the convenience of the official, not for any agency purpose. BNA, 742 F.2d at 1494. The fact that both Mr. Crawford and his predecessor wished to keep appointment books does not raise Mr. Crawford's book to the level of an "agency record."

After reviewing the totality of the circumstances surrounding the creation, maintenance, and use of these appointment books, we find that they are not "agency records" under the FOIA and, therefore, are not subject to its disclosure provisions. OXY Inc., 23 DOE ¶ 80,161, at 80,647 (1993). Accordingly, Mr. Frazier's Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on December 29, 1997, by Charles G. Frazier, Case No. VFA-0361, is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0364, 27 DOE ¶ 80,104

January 20, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Charlene Pazar

Date of Filing: December 22, 1997

Case Number: VFA-0364

On December 22, 1997, Charlene Pazar (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Rocky Flats Field Office (RFFO). RFFO issued this determination on November 19, 1997 in response to the request for information the Appellant submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require that RFFO release in its entirety a document it withheld.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In her FOIA request, the Appellant sought access to a copy of the "Final Report that was prepared for the RFFO Office of Chief Counsel by David Frederickson of the Albuquerque Operations Office." In its response, RFFO withheld the requested report (the Frederickson report) pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). Specifically, the Deputy Counsel stated that the Frederickson report is exempt from mandatory disclosure because it is privileged as attorney work product. The Appellant argues in response that disclosure would serve the public interest because the Frederickson report was funded by taxpayers.(1)

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of the Determination

Essentially, the RFFO determination contained one substantive sentence, "[t]his document is an ?attorney work-product privilege' [sic] and is withholdable under exemption (b)(5)." We find this determination to be inadequate. OHA has held that a description of a withheld document is adequate if it identifies the subject matter and, if available, the date upon which the document was produced and its authors and recipients. Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,527 (1984) (Arnold & Porter). The description need not, however, contain information that would compromise the privileged nature of the document. Id. at 80,527. A determination must also adequately justify the withholding of a document by explaining briefly how the claimed exemption applies to the document. Id.; Paul W. Fox, 25 DOE ¶ 80,150 (1995). With the exception of naming the author of the Frederickson report, none of the other descriptive items required by the Arnold & Porter decision were provided in the determination letter. More importantly, RFFO failed to provide any explanation of how the attorney work-product privilege applies to the Frederickson report. However, for reasons of administrative efficiency, we will decide this Appeal based on our own review of the Frederickson report and information regarding that document gathered from our discussions with RFFO.

B. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 protects from mandatory disclosure "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). The U.S. Supreme Court has held that this exemption incorporates every civil discovery privilege that the government enjoys under statutory and case law. United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 465 U.S. 792, 799 (1984) (Weber); FTC v. Grolier, 462 U.S. 19 (1983) (Grolier). See also Peter T. Torell, 15 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1987). Therefore, any material that is privileged in civil discovery is also shielded from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 5. Accordingly, if the Frederickson report falls within a civil discovery privilege, it may be withheld under Exemption 5.

As previously stated, RFFO relied upon the attorney work-product privilege in withholding the Frederickson report. The attorney work-product privilege serves to "provide working attorneys with a ? zone of privacy' within which to think, plan, weigh facts and evidence . . . , and prepare legal theories." Coastal States Gas Corp. v. DOE, 617 F.2d 854, 864 (D.C. Cir. 1980). It protects documents prepared by an attorney in contemplation of litigation. Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 509-10 (1947); Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3). This privilege is also applicable to material prepared by a non-attorney who was supervised by an attorney. Nishnic v. Department of Justice, 671 F. Supp. 771, 772-73 (D.D.C. 1987). Finally, because factual work-product is not "routinely" or "normally" discoverable, it is also protectable under Exemption 5. See Grolier, 462 U.S. at 26; Weber, 465 U.S. at 799.

We find that the Frederickson report meets each of the requirements for finding a document to be attorney work-product. The Frederickson report was prepared in contemplation of litigation because it was created solely in response to a Merit Systems Protection Board (MSPB) claim by a Mr. Ridenour. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn L. Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA and James D. Long, Jr., Staff Attorney, Office of Chief Counsel, RFFO (January 5, 1998). The purpose of the Frederickson report was to provide the RFFO Office of Chief Counsel with a discussion of the factual bases for Mr. Ridenour's MSPB claims. Id. It was prepared by Mr. Frederickson, a non-attorney, who was functioning for this purpose under the direct supervision of the RFFO Office of Chief Counsel. Id. Further, the Frederickson report has been kept strictly confidential by the RFFO Office of Chief Counsel. Id. We conclude that the withheld Frederickson report is clearly attorney work-product.

C. Public Interest Determination

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We find that release of the withheld Frederickson report would not be in the public interest. In her Appeal, the Appellant argues that the withheld Frederickson report should be released because it was funded by the taxpayers. However, many documents are produced by employees of the federal government with taxpayer money that are nonetheless withholdable under the FOIA. In this case, the release of the Frederickson report would result in foreseeable harm to the interests protected by the attorney work-product privilege. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (in order to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeably harm basic institutional interests that underlie Exemption 5). As Justice Brennan stated in Grolier, "[i]t would be of substantial benefit to an opposing party (and of corresponding detriment to an agency) if the party could obtain work product generated by the agency in connection with earlier, similar litigation against other persons . . . [H]e could gain insight into the agency's general strategic and tactical approach to deciding . . . on what terms [lawsuits] may be settled." Grolier, 462 U.S. 19 at 30 (Brennan, J., concurring).

The Frederickson report discusses facts and issues underlying several ongoing legal conflicts between DOE and Mr. Ridenour. See Record of Telephone Memorandum between Dawn L. Goldstein and James D. Long, Jr. (January 5, 1998). Further, although the MSPB action that was the catalyst for the creation of the Frederickson report has been dismissed, Mr. Long believes that because that case was dismissed on procedural grounds, it will likely be refiled. We therefore find that the release of the Frederickson report could conceivably compromise the DOE's strategy and tactics in the cases concerning Mr. Ridenour.

D. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we find that RFFO correctly determined that the withheld Frederickson report is exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5, and that release of the report would not be in the public interest. The Appeal will therefore be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Charlene Pazar on December 22, 1997 is hereby denied.

(1)*/ The Appellant also questioned the propriety of Mr. Frederickson preparing the report and his method of preparation. In addition, the Appellant wished to know the reason for the report and Mr. Frederickson's qualifications to prepare such a report. An Appeal under FOIA is not the proper forum for these questions, since the FOIA's object is to make available to the public non-exempt agency records. In addition, requests for documents that might answer these questions are outside the scope of the Appellant's initial FOIA request. The OHA will therefore not consider these questions in the context of the present Appeal. Cox Newspapers, 22 DOE ¶ 80,106 at 80,512 (1992).

February 11, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Marjorie A. Jillson

Date of Filing: January 14, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0366

On January 14, 1998, Marjorie A. Jillson filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her on December 11, 1997, by the Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division (FOIA Division) of the Department of Energy. That determination concerned a request for information Ms. Jillson filed pursuant to the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be required to conduct a further search for the requested information.

I. Background

On November 4, 1997, Ms. Jillson filed a request for information in which she sought records pertaining to the use of radioiodine (I-131) on her at the Harper Hospital in Detroit, Michigan in 1954. On December 11, 1997, the FOIA Division issued a determination which stated that the Coordination Information Center conducted a search of DOE-86, "Human Radiation Experiment Records," a system of records established pursuant to the Privacy Act. The search found no records maintained in that system of records that were responsive to Ms. Jillson's request. On January 14, 1998, Ms. Jillson filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). Ms. Jillson asks that the OHA direct the Authorizing Official to conduct a new search for responsive documents.

II. Analysis

The Privacy Act requires, inter alia, that each federal agency permit an individual to gain access to information pertaining to him or her which is contained in any system of records maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information is retrieved by the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R.

We have investigated the search undertaken by the FOIA Division in response to Ms. Jillson's request, and have been advised that a thorough search of the only relevant system of records has been conducted. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Kimberly Jenkins-Chapman, OHA Staff Attorney, and Tanya Woods, FOIA and Privacy Act Analyst, FOIA Division (January 16, 1998). In response to Ms. Jillson's request, the Coordination Information Center conducted a search of a system known as DOE-86, "Human Radiation Experiment Records." The FOIA Division has indicated that it searched this system of records by Ms. Jillson's name and by a description of the experiment and found no information maintained in the system of records that was responsive to Ms. Jillson's request. The FOIA Division further indicated that DOE-86 is the only system of records likely to contain information of the type described in Ms. Jillson's request.

Based on the foregoing, we conclude that the FOIA Division has adequately searched all the systems of records under its control that might reasonably be expected to contain the material sought by Ms. Jillson. Accordingly, the present Appeal will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Privacy Act Appeal filed Marjorie A. Jillson on January 14, 1998, OHA Case No. VFA- 0366, is hereby denied.

February 17, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

APPEAL

Name of Petitioner: Diane C. Larson

Date of Filing: January 16, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0367

On January 16, 1998, Diane C. Larson (the Appellant) completed the filing of an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) under the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. In this Appeal, the Appellant requested that OHA review a determination issued on December 12, 1997, by the Office of Energy Intelligence, within the Office of Non-Proliferation and National Security, to ascertain whether an adequate search had been conducted for documents responsive to the Appellant's Privacy Act request. The Appellant also asked that OHA order the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) to expedite the issuance of a determination on her Privacy Act request.

BACKGROUND

In September, 1997, the Appellant submitted a Privacy Act request(1) to the Freedom of Information Act /Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat (Headquarters FOIA Office) seeking copies of documents containing counter-intelligence information or pertaining to a certain investigation conducted by the OIG.(2) On October 10, 1997, a Management Analyst at the Headquarters FOIA Office asked the staffs of the Office of Energy Intelligence and OIG to search their office files for responsive records. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Tonya Woods and Linda Lazarus, OHA Staff Attorney (February 13, 1998).

On December 12, 1997, the Director of the Office of Energy Intelligence issued a determination letter to the Appellant. In this letter, the Director stated that his staff had searched the office files for responsive records, but that no records were found.

The Appellant has appealed the determination issued by the Office of Energy Intelligence on the grounds that the staff of this office had failed to conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover the requested documents. The Appellant also requests that OHA order OIG to expedite the issuance of a determination in response to her Privacy Act request.

ANALYSIS

As detailed below, we shall deny this Appeal because we find that the search conducted by the staff of the Office of Energy Intelligence was adequate, and we lack jurisdiction to review the processing of Appellant's Privacy Act request by the OIG.

I. The Search Conducted by the Office of Energy Intelligence

This case involves a search for documents under the Privacy Act. The Privacy Act requires, inter alia, that each federal agency permit an individual to gain access to information about himself that is contained in any system of records maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information is retrieved by the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.2(m). Under the Privacy Act, an office that issues a determination to a requester must insure that it has searched for records that are retrieved by the name or other personal identifier of the requester in every relevant system of records under its control.

We have often reviewed the adequacy of a search conducted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. A Privacy Act request requires only a search of systems of records, rather than a search of all agency records, as is required under the FOIA. Nevertheless, the standard of sufficiency that we demand of a Privacy Act search is no less rigorous than that of a FOIA search. Therefore we will analyze the adequacy of the Privacy Act search conducted by the Office of Energy Intelligence using principles that we have developed under the FOIA. See Anibal L. Taboas, 25 DOE ¶ 80,207 at 80,775 (1996).

Under the FOIA, an office must conduct a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. See Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). Although we require that a comprehensive search be conducted under the FOIA, we do not require that this search be exhaustive. We require only that a FOIA search be reasonable. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

To determine whether the search conducted in response to the Appellant’s Privacy Act request was reasonable, we contacted several members of the staff of the Office of Energy Intelligence. A Research Specialist of that office informed us that if documents responsive to this request were in the Office of Energy Intelligence, such documents would be found in the Division of Counterintelligence or the Intelligence Support Division. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Loretta Lanier and Linda Lazarus (February 13, 1998).

An Intelligence Analyst assigned to the Division of Counterintelligence explained that he was responsible for the search that had been conducted in that Division. He explained that this Division maintains two systems of records, DOE-81, "Counterintelligence Administrative Analytical Records and Reports," and DOE-84, "Counterintelligence Investigative Records," that could contain responsive documents.(3) The Intelligence Analyst conducted a computerized search of DOE-81 using the Appellant’s name and found no responsive records. The Intelligence Analyst also stated that, at his behest, another employee searched DOE-84 for records containing the Appellant’s name, and that this employee had reported to him that no responsive records had been found. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Gary Chidester and Linda Lazarus (February 6, 1998).

We also spoke to a Security Specialist in the Intelligence Support Division concerning the search conducted for records in that Division. The Security Specialist stated that the only records in her Division that could be responsive to the Appellant’s Privacy Act request would be located in file cabinets and notebooks containing non-disclosure agreements signed by individuals who have access to "Sensitive Compartmented Information" (SCI). She further explained that the non-disclosure agreements of individuals who currently have access to SCI are maintained in file cabinets, and the non-disclosure agreements of individuals who have had access to SCI in the past, but no longer have such access, are kept in notebooks. She stated that the Intelligence Support Division maintains both in alphabetical order. The Security Specialist told us that when the request came in for records involving the Appellant, she checked the appropriate locations in the file cabinets and the notebooks, but found no documents involving the Appellant. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Patricia Pettaway and Linda Lazarus (February 6, 1998).

Based on the above, the staff of the Office of Energy Intelligence has convinced us that it followed procedures that were reasonably calculated to uncover the materials that the Appellant sought in her Privacy Act request. Consequently, we shall deny the portion of the Appeal that relates to the adequacy of the search conducted by this office.(4)

II. OHA Lacks Jurisdiction to Order OIG to Expedite A Privacy Act Request

The Appellant requests that OHA order OIG to expedite the processing of her Privacy Act request. However, for the reasons detailed below, we must dismiss this portion of the Appeal because OHA does not have jurisdiction over this matter.

Section 1008.11(a) of the DOE regulations sets forth the circumstances under which an individual may file an appeal with OHA under the Privacy Act. It provides, in relevant part, that "[a]ny individual may appeal the denial of a request made by him for information about or for access to or correction or amendment of records."

We have consistently construed regulations that set forth the circumstances under which an individual may file an appeal with OHA to be jurisdictional. See Suffolk County, 17 DOE ¶ 80,111 at 80,524 (1988) (Section 1004.8(a) construed to confer jurisdiction on OHA over a FOIA appeal only when an Authorizing Official has issued a determination); John H. Hnatio, 13 DOE ¶ 80,119 at 80,566 (1985) (dismissing appeal because no determination issued); Tulsa Tribune, 11 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,741 (1984) (no administrative remedy for agency's non-compliance with a timeliness requirement). We hold that the reasoning of these cases is fully applicable here. Accordingly, because Section 1008.11(a) permits Privacy Act appeals to be filed with OHA only after a denial has been issued by a Privacy Act Officer, OHA lacks jurisdiction to hear a Privacy Act appeal in the absence of the issuance of such a denial. For this reason, we must dismiss the portion of this Appeal in which the Appellant has requested that OHA order OIG to expedite the issuance of a determination.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Diane Larson on January 16, 1998, is hereby dismissed to the extent that it requests the Office of Hearings and Appeals to order the Office of Inspector General to expedite the processing of the Appellant's request under the Privacy Act, and in all other respects is hereby denied.

George B. Breznay

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: February 17, 1998

(1)Although the Appellant requested later that DOE search for additional documents, this Appeal relates only to matters that were requested in the original Privacy Act request.

(2)In her Privacy Act request, the Appellant asked for records from the OIG regarding Case No. I-96RS154. The Appellant had previously filed a FOIA request for these records, but this request was denied on the grounds that these documents were exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(A) of the FOIA because release of these documents "could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C.§552(b)(7)(A). On October 10, 1997, after the Appellant had requested these records under the Privacy Act , the Director of the Headquarters FOIA Office wrote a letter to the Appellant stating that the law enforcement proceeding had been completed, and that "every effort will be made to process your request as quickly as possible."

(3)The Intelligence Analyst further explained that DOE-81 contains, among other things, analytical reports, travel reports, and reports on foreign contacts of certain current and former DOE and contractor employees, and that DOE-84 contains reports that relate to investigations of counter-intelligence matters. He indicated that although these two systems of records were created in 1994, they both encompass records that have been in existence since 1991.

(4)In support of her argument that the search performed by the Office of Energy Intelligence was inadequate, the Appellant indicated that responsive records may be located in the Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque). However, the determination that is the subject of this Appeal was issued by the Office of Energy Intelligence, a Headquarters office, and not by Albuquerque. We understand, however, that the Headquarters FOIA Office is in the process of officially forwarding the Appellant’s Privacy Act request to Albuquerque, and will ask Albuquerque to issue a determination directly to the Appellant. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Tonya Woods and Linda Lazarus (February 13, 1998).

February 3, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: The Oregonian

Date of Filing: January 5, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0368

On January 5, 1998, The Oregonian, a newspaper located in Portland, Oregon, filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it by the Department of Energy's Bonneville Power Administration (BPA). The BPA issued this determination in response to requests for information that the newspaper submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require that documents that the BPA withheld be released in whole or in part.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its FOIA requests, The Oregonian sought access to all expense records and related correspondence pertaining to the defense of lawsuits filed by Chase Manhattan Bank and Tenaska Washington Partners II against the BPA. In response to the requests, the BPA released a wealth of material - mainly copies of contracts by which it has procured legal advice, analysis and assistance in contesting the lawsuits. The BPA withheld a number of documents, including travel vouchers, estimates of future litigation expenses, and invoices for shipping, travel, courier and legal expenses pursuant to the attorney-client and attorney work product privileges encompassed by Exemption 5 of the FOIA. In its determination, BPA stated that release of these documents "might prejudice BPA in the current litigation with Tenaska by revealing BPA's litigation strategies." BPA Determination at 2.

In its Appeal, The Oregonian claims that BPA has applied Exemption 5 too broadly in withholding these expense-related documents in their entirety. Specifically, the newspaper contends that BPA has improperly withheld documents "which cannot possibly reveal attorney thought processes or truly confidential attorney-client communications." Appeal at 3.

II. Analysis

A. Applicability of Exemption 5

Exemption 5 shields from mandatory disclosure "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). This Exemption is generally recognized as encompassing the attorney-client, attorney work product and governmental deliberative process privileges. See, e.g., Coastal States Gas Corp. v. DOE, 617 F.2d 854 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). As previously stated, the BPA relied upon the attorney- client and attorney work product privileges of Exemption 5.

The attorney-client privilege exists to protect confidential communications between attorneys and their clients made for the purpose of securing or providing legal advice. In Re: Grand Jury Proceedings 88-9 (MIA), 899 F.2d 1039 (11th Cir. 1990). Not all communications between attorney and client are privileged, however. The courts have limited the protection of the privilege to those disclosures necessary to obtain or provide legal advice. Accordingly, the privilege does not extend to social, informational, or procedural communications between attorney and client.

The attorney work product privilege protects from disclosure documents which reveal the "mental impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories of an attorney or other representative of a party concerning the litigation." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3). This privilege is applicable to documents that were prepared by an attorney "in contemplation of litigation." Coastal States at 864.

It is well settled that attorney fee information is generally not privileged. See, e.g., Clark v. American Commerce National Bank, 974 F.2d 1039 (9th Cir. 1992) (Clark); United States v. Leventhal, 961 F.2d 936, 940 (11th Cir. 1992); Indian Law Resource Center, 477 F. Supp. 144, 147 (D.D.C. 1979). However, in those cases where a party has been able to show that the attorney billing statements at issue reveal litigation strategy, substantive communications or the specific nature of the services provided by the attorneys, such as research into a particular area of the law, courts have found them to be privileged. Clark, 974 F.2d at 129. Accordingly, we have held that information in expense records pertaining to the total amount charged by a law firm for a litigation, the attorneys' identities, their hourly rates, and the costs of travel, reporting services and document reproduction are generally not exempt from disclosure pursuant to the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges. See, e.g., William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,161 (1997); C.D. Varnadore, 24 DOE ¶ 80,123 (1994). Information that could reveal the litigation strategy, thoughts or impressions of the attorneys, however, such as dates and descriptions of the specific services provided and the monthly and daily totals of hours billed by each attorney, is protected from mandatory disclosure under these privileges. Id.

Applying these principles to the present case, we find that some of the material withheld by BPA is not subject to the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges. This non-exempt material includes information pertaining to travel, copying, communications, shipping and courier service expenses, as well as the attorneys' identities. Based on the record before us, we cannot conclude that release of this information would reveal BPA's litigation strategy or the mental impressions, conclusions, or legal theories of their attorneys.

These expense statements, however, also contain information which could reflect BPA's litigation strategy or the thoughts and conclusions of BPA's outside counsel. This information consists of the descriptions of the specific services performed by the attorneys, the dates on which those services were performed, the hours billed by each attorney, and the amounts charged for each attorney's services. Disclosure of this information would provide opposing counsel with insights into BPA's litigation strategy and would reveal the timing and intensity of the legal services provided. Release of the number of hours billed by the attorneys, as well as the dollar amounts charged, would indicate the manner in which the outside counsel's legal services were being allocated and could therefore reveal an important component of BPA's legal strategy. This information was therefore properly withheld under Exemption 5.

B. Segregability

Although the attorneys' billing statements contain some privileged information, BPA has not adequately segregated non-exempt material from these documents. The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). However, segregation and release of non-exempt material are not necessary when it is inextricably intertwined with the exempt material, such that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the confidentiality of the withheld material. Lead Industries Association v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979).

In view of the foregoing, we will remand this matter to BPA. On remand, BPA should review the withheld material in accordance with the guidelines set forth above, and should make every reasonable attempt to segregate and release non-exempt material.

C. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

We find that release of the exempt material would not be in the public interest. Disclosure of the exempt portions of these expense statements would harm the interests protected by the attorney- client and attorney work product privileges by revealing the BPA's litigation strategy and the thought processes of outside counsel. BPA's ability to conduct this litigation in an effective and efficient manner would therefore be compromised. Moreover, release of this information could discourage BPA's outside counsel from providing similarly detailed information in future billings, thus impeding BPA's ability to effectively monitor and control legal costs. Accordingly, we conclude that release of the withheld information would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by Exemption 5. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (in order to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeably harm basic institutional interests that underlie Exemption 5).

D. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we will remand this matter to BPA. On remand, BPA should withhold those portions of the expense information that we have found to be exempt from mandatory disclosure and then either release the remaining portions or provide specific justifications for withholding any additional material.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by The Oregonian on January 5, 1998 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Bonneville Power Administration for further proceedings consistent with the guidelines set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:FOIA Group, Inc.

Date of Filing:January 20, 1998

Case Number:VFA-0369

On January 20, 1998, FOIA Group, Inc. filed an Appeal from a determination the Acting Senior Vice President of the Power Business Line (VP) of the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to it on November 10, 1997. In that determination, the VP partially granted a request for information that FOIA Group, Inc. filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In its request for information, FOIA Group, Inc. sought a copy of “the contract and any relevant attachments, including all task orders and deliverables, concerning agreement executed between BPA and New Energy Ventures (NEV) for wholesale of [sic] power from BPA.” In his determination, the VP released a copy of the requested contract, but deleted annual prices, pricing terms, delivery terms, annual demand amounts of power BPA would supply, and annual revenue amounts in accordance with Exemption 4 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). FOIA Group, Inc. contends that “contractors are aware that the disclosure of contract pricing data is a requirement of doing business with the Government.” Furthermore, FOIA Group, Inc. maintains that since the Government requires that firms submit contract pricing data, Exemption 4 does not protect the release of this information. Finally, FOIA Group, Inc. argues that “the failure to disclose the contract(s) [sic] pricing provides the incumbent contractor with a significant and unfair competitive advantage over other companies in any other comparable contract opportunity.”

Analysis

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provides to an agency voluntarily is

"confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In choosing between these two tests, we have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposals. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Glen M. Jameson, 25 DOE ¶ 80,191 (1996) (Jameson); Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

FOIA Group, Inc. is incorrect when it argues that Exemption 4 does not protect the release of contract pricing data. In appropriate cases, Exemption 4 protects the release of the type of information the requester seeks. We have carefully reviewed the redacted information and have confirmed that the DOE withheld annual prices, pricing and delivery terms, annual demand amounts of power BPA would supply and total revenue amounts. We find that all of the contract pricing (including annual prices) and delivery terms, the annual power demand amounts, and revenue amounts are commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. The DOE obtained this material from a "person" as Exemption 4 requires, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). We also conclude that the contract pricing and delivery terms, the annual power demand amounts, and revenue amounts are confidential because the release of any item would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. We have stated in the past that a competitor could use the release of cost and financial information to undercut another firm's bids and thus effectively eliminate the disclosing firm from competition. See International Technology Corporation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1992); U.S. Rentals, 21 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1991). In this case, for example, if the submitter released its prices and delivery terms, annual power demand amounts, and revenue amounts, any competitor could easily determine how to adjust its proposal to offer more favorable terms than the submitter in a future bid process.

We do not find any merit to FOIA Group, Inc.'s other arguments. First, FOIA Group, Inc. argues that "contractors are aware that the disclosure of contract pricing data is a requirement of doing business with the Government." The courts have not reached as broad a conclusion. For example, the District Court for the District of Columbia held that "[d]isclosure of prices charged the Government is a cost of doing business with the Government," but only in the absence of a showing of competitive harm. Racal-Milgo Gov't Sys. v. SBA, 559 F. Supp. 4, 6 (D.D.C. 1981). In this case, we find that the DOE properly identified a competitive harm to the submitter if the DOE were to release the withheld information. Accordingly, we find that withholding the requested information is appropriate here. Second, FOIA Group, Inc. argues that "the failure to disclose the contract(s) [sic] pricing provides the incumbent contractor with a significant and unfair competitive advantage over other companies in any other comparable contract opportunity." We do not agree. Exemption 4 protects commercial information from disclosure when a contractor might experience competitive harm from that disclosure, but that protection is not set aside when a competitor claims that he has suffered a competitive disadvantage. As stated above, we find that the DOE properly applied Exemption 4. Therefore, FOIA Group, Inc.'s argument that they are at a competitive disadvantage with respect to the incumbent contractor is without merit. However, we find that the DOE should release some information, specifically, topic headings. Accordingly, we will direct the VP to release the topic headings on Revision No. 1, Exhibit C, Page 1 of 3, of Contract No. 96MS-95243 or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any of these headings.

The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by FOIA Group, Inc. on January 20, 1998, Case No. VFA-0369, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Acting Senior Vice President of the Power Business Line of the Bonneville Power Administration of the Department of Energy, who will release headings on Revision No. 1, Exhibit C, Page 1 of 3, of Contract No. 96MS-95243 or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any of these headings.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Janice C. Curry

Date of Filing: January 23, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0370

On January 23, 1998, Janice C. Curry (Curry) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Office of Environmental Management (EM) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to her. The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Ms. Curry challenges EM's withholding of responsive information.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

Curry was employed by a DOE contractor at DOE headquarters in Washington, D.C. In January and February 1997, some of Curry's co-workers documented incidents in which Curry allegedly displayed aggressive, threatening behavior towards her colleagues. Curry was terminated in March 1997. On March 6, 1997, Curry requested that the DOE provide her "any and all documents relating to my employment as a contractor at the Department of Energy. Specifically a letter that was submitted around the week of February 3, 1997, stating that I was a threat to public health and safety." Letter from Curry to Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Office, DOE (March 6, 1997) (OHA Case No. VFA-0313). On June 20, 1997, EM responded that it had identified one responsive document, a February 6, 1997 memorandum to Cynthia Brawner-Gaines of EM's Office of Minority Affairs (EM/MA), discussing a request to remedy a personnel problem that created an unsafe working environment in EM. Letter from Barry Clark, EM, to Curry (June 20, 1997) (OHA Case No. VFA- 0313). However, EM withheld the document in its entirety pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA. Id. Curry filed an Appeal with OHA on July 24, 1997. OHA reviewed the withheld document and remanded the matter to EM for reconsideration of the basis for withholding and for a further search for responsive documents. Janice Curry, 26 DOE ¶ 80,218 (1997) (C*urry*). On January 16, 1998, EM issued a new determination, stating that it had located two additional responsive documents, but was withholding all three documents in their entirety also under FOIA Exemptions 6, 7(C) and 7(F). Letter from Barry R. Clark, EM, to Curry (January 16, 1998) (Determination Letter). On January 23, 1998, Curry filed this Appeal which, if granted, would require EM to release the responsive documents to her.

II. Analysis

A. Exemption 6

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C.§ 552(b)(6); 10 C. F. R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

In order to determine whether information may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of HUD, 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the government. See Hopkins v. Department of HUD, 929 F.2d 81, 88 (2d Cir. 1991); Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749 (1989) (Reporters Committee); FLRA v. Department of Treasury Financial Management Service, 884 F.2d 1446, 1451 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 864 (1990). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 762-770.

1. Privacy Interest

In its determination, EM stated that the three withheld documents "allege that on numerous occasions [Curry] engaged in physically threatening and intimidating behavior and, as a result, . . . co-workers feared for their physical safety." EM withheld the documents because the allegations were "made by a relatively small number of individuals and concerned events in which [Curry] participated, . . . [which] could lead to ascertainment of the identity of the individuals." Determination Letter at 1. Where a person's fear of reprisals from the subject of a communication is "reasonable" based on either demonstrated fact or inferences supported by reasonable claims, privacy interests support the application of Exemption 6. Fine v. DOE, 823 F. Supp. 888, 895 (D. N. M. 1993) (Fine) (quoting Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity v. F.B.I., 683 F.2d 562, 565 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (upholding agency's nondisclosure of letters describing bizarre activities of plaintiff due to author's fear of reprisal)). However, after reviewing the withheld documents, we find that EM has not offered facts or supported inferences tending to show that Curry may be inclined to harass or intimidate her former colleagues. All of the incidents discussed in the memos occurred one year ago at DOE headquarters. EM presented no evidence that Curry has harassed, intimidated, or even attempted to communicate with her former colleagues since the allegations surfaced and she lost her job. As the court stated in Fine,

Defendant has offered neither facts nor supported inferences tending to show plaintiff might be inclined to harass or intimidate persons. Plaintiff is no longer employed by the defendant so he is not in a position on-the-job to harass or intimidate employees of DOE/OIG and/or its contractors. The Court, therefore, does not find justifiable defendant's repeated invoking of Exemption 6 to prevent harassment or intimidation by plaintiff.

Fine, 823 F. Supp. at 895-96 (quoted in Curry, 26 DOE at 80,853). Curry is no longer employed at the DOE site where these incidents allegedly occurred, and thus is not in a position to harass the authors of the three documents at their offices. In fact, even though she claims to know who wrote the documents, she has had no contact with those individuals since her employment ended. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Curry and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (February 23, 1998).

Therefore, we find that EM has not offered facts supporting its use of Exemption 6 to withhold the documents to prevent harassment or intimidation by the requester.

Nonetheless, there is a privacy interest in the names and identifying information of those individuals who provided information to their managers about the alleged threatening behavior. Information that identifies a specific individual can be protected under Exemption 6. Department of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 154, 176 (1991) ("[t]he invasion of privacy becomes significant when personal information is linked to particular interviewees"). Even though there was no evidence of a formal investigation, we find a privacy interest in the opinions expressed in these documents. See Dennis McQuade, 25 DOE ¶ 80,158 (1996) (finding a privacy interest in the candid opinions of witnesses concerning their co-workers). Therefore, we find a significant privacy interest in the contents of the withheld documents.

2. Public Interest

The Supreme Court has held that there is a public interest in disclosure of information that "sheds light on an agency's performance of its statutory duties." Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 773; Marlene Flor, 26 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,511 (1996) (Flor). The requester has the burden of establishing that disclosure would serve the public interest. Flor, 26 DOE at 80,511 (quoting Carter v. Department of Commerce, 830 F.2d 388 (D.C. Cir. 1987)). We find that Curry has not met this burden, and that there is no public interest in the responsive material.

Curry contends that the release of the material being withheld is in the public interest because it describes the actions, taken or not taken, by government employees in response to the written complaints about her behavior. We do not agree. The release of the withheld material would not aid the public in understanding how EM/MA performs its statutory duties. The information is very specific to several incidents in the workplace, and does not shed light on the general operations or policy of EM. Thus, we conclude that there is no public interest in the responsive material, and EM properly invoked the protection of Exemption 6 in its withholding.

B. Exemption 7

EM also invoked the protection of Exemptions 7(C) and 7(F) in withholding the three documents from Curry. Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). Exemption 7(F) permits an agency to withhold records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes "if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to endanger the life or physical safety of any individual." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(F); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(vi). We find that Exemptions 7(C) and 7(F) do not apply in this case.

The threshold requirement in any Exemption 7 inquiry is whether the documents are compiled for law enforcement purposes, i.e. as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. See William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996); F.B.I. v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). An organization withholding material under Exemption 7 must have statutory authority to enforce a violation of a law or regulation within its authority. Church of Scientology v. Department of the Army, 611 F.2d 738, 748 (9th Cir. 1979) (remanding to Naval Investigative Service to show that investigation involved enforcement of statute or regulation within its authority). For example, we have consistently found that the DOE's Office of the Inspector General (IG) compiles reports for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7. See Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1997) ("The IG is a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate."); Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1997); William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996); Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1995). After a review of the facts of this case, we find that EM/MA has not provided evidence that it has the "requisite law enforcement mandate" to invoke the protection of Exemption 7. See, e.g., Church of Scientology

International v. IRS, 995 F.2d 916, 919 (9th Cir. 1993) (law enforcement mandate provided by enforcement provisions of federal tax code). Without evidence of the statutory foundation of the alleged law enforcement authority of EM/MA's ombudsman, we cannot apply Exemption 7 in this case. Even assuming, arguendo, that Exemption 7 applies, it would permit the withholding of no information other than that previously identified as exempt from disclosure under Exemption 6.

C. Segregability

The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt. . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (1982). We do not agree with EM that "virtually the entire content of each [document] would reveal the identity of the person providing it." Determination Letter at 4. EM writes in its determination that "names, dates, places, conversations, descriptions of events and information that would lead to the ascertainment of the positions of the authors" can be considered protected under Exemption 6. However, in Fine the court stated that although identifying information and personal opinions are exempt, a document should not be withheld in its entirety if it contains factual, non- private information. Fine, 823 F. Supp. at 898. The court did not extend the protection of Exemption 6 to a conversation that occurred while the requester was present. Id. ("No information of a private nature is contained therein, nor does the fact that this conversation was memorialized in a memorandum raise it to the level of a significant privacy interest.").

We find that there is non-exempt, reasonably segregable material in the withheld documents that can be disclosed under the FOIA. Specifically, the February 7, 1997 memorandum to Ms. Brawner- Gaines, released twice to OHA for review, contains information that is not identifiable to a specific individual. Paragraph 1 does not contain material that would "lead to the ascertainment of the position of the author." Paragraph 2 contains non-exempt material that could be released with appropriate redactions and still be meaningful to the requester. On page 2, Paragraph 1 contains a substantial amount of non-exempt, segregable material, as does Paragraph 2 and its three sub- paragraphs. (1) Those documents recounting conversations in which Curry participated are also subject to the analysis in the previous paragraph. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to EM for the purpose of issuing a new determination to Ms. Curry.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Janice C. Curry on January 23, 1998, Case Number VFA-0370, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Office of Environmental Management, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0371, 27 DOE ¶ 80,112

February 20, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Ruth Towle Murphy

Date of Filing:January 26, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0371

On January 26, 1998, Ruth Towle Murphy (Appellant), filed an Appeal from a determination the Manager of the Oak Ridge Operations Office (Manager) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to her on November 14, 1997. In that determination, the Manager partially granted a request for information that the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In her request for information, the Appellant sought copies of "[A]ll of the entire work/service contracts between OSTI [Office of Scientific and Technical Information] and SAIC [Science Applications International Corporation], from the initial contract up to the contract covering 1997." In his determination, the Manager released copies of the contract and various contract modification documents between SAIC and the DOE pertaining to OSTI, but deleted 'key personnel [names], hourly rates, profit and G&A [General and Administrative] percentages, and the total estimated amounts in accordance with 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4).” The Appellant contends that “only information obtained from an individual, a partnership, or a corporation, other than a government agency, qualifies under the fourth exemption” of the FOIA (emphasis in original). She argues that since both the DOE and the submitter signed the contract she seeks, in essence, the DOE obtained the contract from itself. Since Exemption 4 does not apply to documents obtained from a government agency, the Appellant contends that the Manager improperly applied Exemption 4. The Appellant also asserts that she does not seek SAIC marketing plans or profit and loss information, or other similar SAIC commercial information but only the information contained in the contract documents. Because the information withheld in the documents is not SAIC financial information, Appellant believes that the Manager improperly applied Exemption 4.

Analysis

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provides to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public. Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In choosing between these two tests, we have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposals. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Glen M. Jameson, 25 DOE ¶ 80,191 (1996) (Jameson); Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

The Appellant is incorrect when she argues that the DOE obtained the withheld information from itself. Simply because the DOE signed the contract is no indication that the DOE had anything to do with the creation of the information. In the present case, the submitter, SAIC, created and provided the redacted information in response to a request for proposal for the purpose of acquiring the contract. See Memorandum of telephone conversation with Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, Oak Ridge Operations Office, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (February 4, 1998).

The Appellant is also incorrect when she argues that essentially only information such as marketing plans, profit or loss statements or similar information can be construed as "commercial or financial information." The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has rejected the argument that the term "commercial" should be limited to records that "reveal basic commercial operations." Public Citizen Health Research Group v. FDA, 704 F.2d 1280, 1290 (D.C. Cir 1983). We believe that the types of information withheld in the present case are "commercial" since the information was submitted specifically for the purpose of acquiring a contract. See Industrial Constructors Corporation, 25 DOE ¶ 80,196 at 80,739 (1996) (ICC).

With respect to the particular information withheld here, we have obtained copies of the relevant portions of the documents and conducted a review as to the appropriateness of the Manager's withholdings under Exemption 4.

In reviewing the redacted information, we confirm that the DOE withheld only hourly rates, profit and G&A percentages, total yearly estimated labor cost amounts for two facilities (the financial service center and the radiation exposure database), and the names of key personnel to implement the contract. As discussed above, we find that all of this redacted information is commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. The DOE obtained this material from a "person" as required by Exemption 4, since the FOIA considers corporate entities, such as SAIC, as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See ICC; John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). We also conclude that each withheld item - the estimated yearly labor cost amounts, hourly rates, profit and G&A percentages, and the names of key personnel - is confidential because its release would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. We have stated in the past that release of cost and financial information could be used by a competitor to undercut another firm's bids and thus effectively eliminate the disclosing firm from competition. See ICC; International Technology Corporation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1992); U.S. Rentals, 21 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1991). In this case, for example, if the submitter released its estimated costs for completing specific tasks, a competitor could easily determine how to adjust its own costs to arrive at a lower contract price and plan to undercut the submitter's best price and procedures in a future bid process. Furthermore, if the DOE were to release the names of key personnel involved in the contract, a competitor could offer employment to these people in an effort to make his firm more competitive in a future bid process at the expense of the submitter. See Jameson. Accordingly, the withheld information was properly found to be within the scope of Exemption 4.

The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Thus, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4. Consequently, we must deny the Appellant's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Ruth Towle Murphy on January 26, 1998, Case No. VFA-0371, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Sandra M. Hart

Date of Filing: January 29, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0372

On January 29, 1998, Sandra M. Hart (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued to her on January 13, 1998, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Idaho Operations Office (Idaho). In that determination, Idaho released several documents responsive to a request for information the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. However, Idaho withheld portions of one document under FOIA Exemption 6. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

I. BACKGROUND

The present Appeal concerns a determination letter issued to the Appellant on January 13, 1998. In that letter, Idaho released three documents to the Appellant in their entirety but withheld portions of a fourth document, which was an Equal Employment and Opportunity (EEO) complaint filed with the DOE's Office of Civil Rights. Idaho withheld three portions of that complaint citing Exemption 6: (1) two portions of the EEO complaint in which the complaining individual explained why she believed that she was unfairly discriminated against, and (2) a witness statement supporting one of the complaining individual's allegations.

On January 29, 1998, the Appellant filed the present Appeal challenging Idaho's withholdings and contending that (1) she is entitled to the withheld information because it concerns her, (2) the DOE has released information concerning her to third parties, and she should should be treated in the same way as these third parties, and (3) the DOE has failed to segregate releaseable information contained in the withheld portions of the document.

II. ANALYSIS

As an initial matter, it is important to note that a FOIA requester's rights to access are neither increased nor decreased because she may have a greater interest in the records than a member of the general public has. Thus, although the Appellant has requested material concerning herself, her rights under the FOIA are no greater than those of any other requester. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 143 n.10 (1975) (NLRB). (1)

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by federal agencies be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Only Exemptions 6 and 7 are at issue in the present case. (2)

Exemptions 6 and 7(C)

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Williams v. IRS, 479 F.2d 317, 318 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom., Donolon v. IRS, 414 U.S. 1024 (1973). It is well settled that both the EEO counseling and investigatory stages are law enforcement proceedings. Thus, records of an EEO investigation are considered records compiled for law enforcement purposes within the context of the FOIA. Raytheon Company, 25 DOE ¶ 80,156 (1996).

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

(1) Privacy Interest

Witnesses usually provide statements in law enforcement proceedings with an expectation of confidentiality. If this expectation of confidentiality were breached by release of the statements, a significant invasion of the privacy of the individuals providing such statements would occur. The complainant's explanation of why she believed that she had been discriminated against was provided with a similar expectation of privacy. The complainant's statements were made as part of a DOE EEO investigation. Under the DOE's EEO Management Directive, the complainant's statements to investigators are not made available to third parties, including those persons accused of allegedly discriminatory acts. EEO Management Directive at 5-12. Therefore, statements made by EEO complainants at the investigatory stage are, in essence, witness statements.

Moreover, because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals providing information to government investigators. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (KTVY-TV) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770

F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985) (Cucarro); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,524 (1990). Accordingly, we find that the individuals whose statements are being withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

(2) Public Interest in Disclosure

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court greatly narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. Justice Stevens, writing for the Court, distinguished between the general benefits to the public that may result from the release of information, and those benefits that Congress sought to provide the public when it enacted the FOIA. He found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's core purpose. Reporters Committee, 1009 S. Ct. at 1481-84. The Court identified the core purpose of the FOIA as "public understanding of the operations or activities of the Government." Id. at 1483. Therefore, the Court held, only information that contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court accordingly found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990).

It is well settled that disclosure of the identity of individuals who have provided information to government investigators is not "affected with the public interest." See, e.g., Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1205; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469. In the absence of a compelling reason for deviating from this body of precedent, we reach that conclusion in the present case.

(3) The Balancing Test

Because release of the withheld material could reasonably be expected to subject their authors to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of the withheld documents would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Our findings are consistent with those reached by several appellate courts when presented with a similar set of facts. These courts have found that the privacy interests of individuals supplying information to government investigators clearly outweigh the negligible public interest in disclosure. See, e.g., Safecard; KTVY-TV, 919 F.2d at 1469 (finding withholding necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro, 770 F.2d at 359. Accordingly, we find that the withheld information was properly withheld under Exemption 6 and can be properly withheld under Exemption 7(C) as well.

Segregability

The FOIA, as implemented by 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(c), requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). The only exceptions to the requirement of segregation are where exempt and non-exempt material are so "inextricably intertwined" that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the exempt material, Lead Industries Assoc., Inc. v. Occupational Safety and Health Admin., 610 F.2d 70, 85 (2d Cir. 1979), or where non-exempt material is so small and interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate it. Id.

As with any exemption, any reasonably segregable portions of the record must be provided to the requester. Nevertheless, for some documents subject to Exemptions 6 and 7(C), the deletion of personal identifying information is inadequate to protect personal privacy. This may be the case if the requested documents concern a small group of individuals who are known to each other and easily identifiable from information in the documents. For example, the deletion of names and other identifying data concerning a small group of coworkers would be inadequate to protect them from embarrassment or reprisals if the requester could still possibly identify the individuals. Alirez v. NLRB, 676 F.2d 423, 428 (10th Cir. 1982). The records at issue in the present case are a perfect example of such a situation. If we were to release this information, the Appellant would have no difficulty in determining who provided the DOE with the withheld information, resulting in an invasion of significant privacy interests.

Exemption 7(A)

Although Idaho did not withhold the witness statements under Exemption 7(A), we have, upon our de novo review, determined that the exemption applies here. To warrant protection under Exemption 7(A), it must be shown that the release of the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings. The interference need not be established on a document-by-document basis, but can be shown generically as to the types of documents involved. NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 236 (1978). Release of the withheld information at issue in the present case could clearly interfere with the ongoing EEO investigation by affecting the testimony of witnesses, subjecting witnesses to potential reprisals, and deterring other witnesses from providing information. See Dow Jones & Co. v. Department of Justice, 880 F. Supp. 145, 150 (S.D.N.Y. 1995); Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. v. EPA, 856 F.2d 309, 311 (D.C. Cir. 1988). It should therefore be withheld under Exemption 7(A) as well.

Finally, the Appellant contends that Idaho has inconsistently applied the FOIA to her detriment. Specifically, she suggests that other individuals involved in the EEO complaint have been provided with information that she has supplied to the DOE, while she is being denied access to the information that they have supplied to the DOE. While there is no evidence in the record indicating that this assertion is true, even if it is true it is irrelevant to the present Appeal. OHA's jurisdiction over the present Appeal is limited to determining whether or not the information she requested can be withheld under the FOIA.

III. CONCLUSION

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about DOE actions, we are also mindful of the need to preserve the privacy rights of individuals. We are satisfied that the agency is providing as much information here as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights. For the reasons set forth above, we are denying the Freedom of Information Act appeal that Sandra M. Hart filed on January 29, 1998.

It is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Sandra M. Hart on January 29, 1998 (Case Number VFA-0372) is hereby denied.

(1) There is one notable exception to this rule. An agency cannot invoke a FOIA exemption in order to protect a requester's own privacy interest against release to himself. Department of Justice v. Reporters

Come. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 771 (1989). None of the documents at issue in the instant case, however, was withheld to protect the Appellant's privacy interest.

(2) Idaho did not withhold the documents under Exemption 7(C). However, we have determined, sua sponte, that this exemption is relevant here and should be applied.

Case No. VFA-0373, 27 DOE ¶ 80,113

February 26, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: INEEL Research Bureau

Date of Filing: February 5, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0373

On February 5, 1998, the INEEL Research Bureau (IRB) filed an Appeal from a determination issued on January 26, 1998, by the Idaho Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE/ID). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. IRB challenges the adequacy of DOE/ID's search for documents responsive to its request.

I. Background

On January 13, 1998, IRB requested from DOE/ID a "declassified index of classified, confidential, secret, or otherwise restricted documents under the control of [DOE/ID] or its contractors." Letter from Chuck Broscious, Coordinator, IRB, to Information Access Officer, DOE/ID (January 13, 1998). On January 28, 1998, DOE/ID issued a determination to IRB, in which it stated that there "is no such index responsive to your request." IRB filed the present Appeal "based on DOE's inadequate search, and that the denial is contrary to the standard of law."

II. Analysis

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

In support of its Appeal, IRB submitted a letter from John E. Till, Ph.D., President of Radiological Assessments Corporation, whose "experience with DOE's archive system," according to IRB, "is unparalleled." Appeal at 2. In this letter, Dr. Till states, "Unless I am mistaken, all classified documents must be accounted for through an inventory system, and therefore a database must likely already exist."

Letter from John E. Till to Chuck Broscious (December 31, 1997). IRB also notes that in 1988 it received an index of documents from DOE/ID entitled "EG&G Internal Reports Index," and speculated that this index was created by querying a database that tracked all documents under the control of DOE/ID. Electronic Mail from Chuck Broscious to Steven Goering, OHA Staff Attorney (February 13, 1998).

Responding to IRB's Appeal, DOE/ID stated that it has not had document accountability, with its associated index, since June 1992[,] and has never had accountability for all of its classified documents, such as those classified confidential. . . .

DOE-ID's search was adequate, because it is aware of the history associated with accountability systems for classified documents at DOE-ID, and it approached the personnel who are responsible for classified matter protection and control, who have verified that the requested lists do not exist.

Electronic mail from Carl Robertson, Freedom of Information Officer, DOE-ID, to Steven Goering (February 11, 1998). We further queried DOE/ID as to how it would go about finding a particular classified document if it needed to. Electronic mail from Steven Goering to Carl Robertson (February 11, 1998). DOE/ID responded, "When we have been requested to find documents in the last several years, we have had to do a safe by safe or custodian by custodian search. This has led us to argue for a return to accountability several times, but we have never been successful in doing so." Untitled statement from Carl Robertson to Steven Goering (February 18, 1998). Based on the above information, we are satisfied that DOE/ID took reasonable steps to verify that a current index of all classified documents under the control of DOE/ID does not exist.

However, DOE/ID acknowledges that indices had been maintained in the past for the holdings of the INEEL Technical Library and for documents in the possession of DOE/ID that were classified secret. DOE/ID states that because these indices have not been kept up to date, "any indices that we can produce will not reflect the classified document holdings in the possession of DOE-ID or its contractors. We think it would be counterproductive to give out an inaccurate or misleading list." Id. Nonetheless, because IRB's request was not limited to a current index, we believe these indices are responsive to IRB's request. We therefore will remand this matter to DOE/ID, which should release to IRB these indices and any other similar indices that would be responsive to IRB's request, or explain in detail its reasons for withholding responsive documents with reference to one or more FOIA exemptions. That these indices may not accurately reflect the current classified holdings of DOE/ID cannot be the basis for withholding these documents in response to a FOIA request.

We are aware that the request submitted by IRB is subject to more than one reasonable interpretation. To the extent that there is ambiguity as to which documents are being sought by IRB, we encourage DOE/ID and IRB to communicate and work together to resolve any such ambiguity. This type of cooperation assists the agency in fulfilling the intent of the FOIA to make agency records accessible to the public, and it increases administrative efficiency in handling these requests. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(c)(2); see also Douglas L. Parker, 20 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1989); Hartford Courant, 15 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by INEEL Research Bureau, Case Number VFA-0373, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the DOE's Idaho Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

March 10. 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: STAND of Amarillo

Date of Filing: February 9, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0374

STAND of Amarillo (STAND) files this Appeal under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (the Department), at 10 C.F.R. § 1004.(1) The subject of the Appeal is a determination letter issued to STAND by the Freedom of Information (FOI) Officer of the Department's Albuquerque Operations Office (AOO). The determination letter replied to STAND's request for material pursuant to the FOIA. As explained below, we will grant the Appeal and remand this matter to AOO to conduct a further search for documents responsive to STAND's request.

In its original request, STAND asked for materials regarding contamination associated with the dismantling of the W-55 nuclear weapon system from October 1995 to March 1996.(2) The request specified several types of documents that STAND was seeking.

AOO responded by releasing several documents and issuing a determination letter, which noted that these documents constituted AOO's final response to STAND's request. STAND then filed this Appeal, contending that AOO's response was inadequate.

STAND's contention is based on testimony from a hearing conducted by the Department of Labor, Williams et al. vs. Mason & Hanger

Corp., Case Nos. 97-ERA-14, 18-22, June 23-30, 1997. The hearing involved charges of retaliation against whistleblowers at the Pantex facility, which is under the jurisdiction of AOO. STAND's Appeal letter cites what it claims are statements by Pantex employees at the hearing, which indicate that other documents responsive to STAND's request may exist.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated often that an FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. E.g., National Resources Defense Council, 26 DOE ¶ 80,229 (1997); Acadian Gas Pipeline System, 26 DOE ¶ 80,160 (1997); James H. Stebbings, 25 DOE ¶ 80,177 (1996); Butler, Vines and Babb, PLLC, 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995); In Defense of Animals, 24 DOE ¶ 80,151 (1995); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Barton Kaplan, 22 DOE ¶ 80,125 (1992); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,138 (1991); Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1988); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980).

We contacted the staff of the FOI office at AOO and discussed the Appeal with them. The staff agreed to conduct a new search for documents based on the information provided in STAND's Appeal letter. Therefore, though we recognize that AOO has already located documents responsive to STAND's request, we will remand this matter for the limited purpose of conducting a further search for the additional documents described in STAND's Appeal letter. Any additional responsive documents that AOO locates will be released to STAND, or the basis for their withholding will be explained in a new determination letter, with specific reference to one or more FOIA exemptions.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by STAND of Amarillo, Case Number VFA-0374, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0375, 27 DOE ¶ 80,126

April 14, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: FAS Engineering, Inc.

Date of Filing: March 3, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0375

On March 3, 1998, FAS Engineering Incorporated (FAS) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on January 5, 1998 by the Golden Field Office (Golden) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination concerned a request for information that FAS submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, Golden would be ordered to release the requested information.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public, whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On December 1, 1997, FAS filed a FOIA request seeking copies of reviews prepared by members of the Geothermal Power Organization (GPO). These reviews discussed proposals for funding to be considered by the DOE's Geothermal Program. See Appeal Letter at 1. GPO is a non-profit industry organization which was fostered by the DOE in 1995 and whose purposes and objectives include providing the DOE with informed comments on industry-driven research and state-of-the-art geothermal energy technology. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Ray Lasala, Program Manager, Geothermal Energy Program and Kimberly Jenkins-Chapman, Staff Attorney, OHA. Pursuant to a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between GPO and Golden, GPO agreed that it would, inter alia, review proposals for industry projects related to geothermal energy and provide its comments and recommendations to the DOE for consideration.

On January 5, 1998, Golden issued a determination which identified documents responsive to FAS' request. Specifically, Golden identified several reviews that had been prepared by members of GPO and provided to Golden under the terms of the MOU. Golden stated that these documents were exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Further, in its determination, Golden stated that the requested information is both "predecisional and deliberative" and falls clearly within the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5. See Determination Letter at 1.

On March 3, 1998, FAS filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). In its Appeal, FAS challenges Golden's January 5, 1998 determination and asserts that there are "segregable portions [of the requested documents] which do not fall within the FOIA exemptions [sic] and which must be released." In addition, FAS contends that the requested records are not properly withholdable under Exemption 5. See Appeal Letter at 1. For these reasons, FAS requests that the OHA direct Golden to release the requested information.

II. Analysis

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents which are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege, and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corporation v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). In withholding the requested reviews of geothermal energy proposals from FAS, Golden relied upon the "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government decisions and policies are formulated. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. It is intended to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939 (Cl. Ct. 1958)) (Mink). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. In order to be shielded by Exemption 5, a document must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the reviewers rather than the final policy of the agency. Id.

After reviewing the requested documents at issue, we have concluded that the determination made by Golden in applying Exemption 5 was correct and consistent with the principles outlined above. Although the comments and recommendations contained in the reviews were prepared by non- governmental reviewers, they were submitted to DOE at its request and used only for internal DOE purposes. The fact that these reviews were prepared by a non-governmental entity does not alter the application of Exemption 5. It is well established that documents in an agency's possession which are prepared by persons outside the government may still qualify as "inter-agency or intra-agency records." Agencies, in the exercise of their functions, commonly have a special need for the opinions and recommendations of outsiders such as consultants. See CNA Fin. Corp. v. Donovan, 830 F.2d 1132, 1161 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (recognizing the importance of outside consultants in deliberative process privilege context). Both the federal courts and this Office have recognized that where a private entity prepared documents for the government pursuant to a contract or agreement, that party is operating as an agent of the government. See Wu v. National Endowment for the Humanities, 460 F.2d 1030, 1032 (5th Cir. 1972) (recommendations of volunteer consultants protected under Exemption 5). See also Environmental Policy Institute, 16 DOE ¶ 80,113 at 80,531 (1987); Toledo Coalition for Safe Energy, 18 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,528 (1988) (recommendations and opinions of DOE personnel and outside consultants fall within the scope of Exemption 5). Thus, for purposes of Exemption 5, the documents outside consultants produce and submit to DOE are treated as if they had been prepared by DOE employees. See Coalition for Safe Power, 16 DOE ¶ 80,134 at 80,598 (1987). Based on the foregoing, the information requested in this case properly falls within the definition of "intra-agency memoranda."

In addition, the comments and recommendations contained in the reviews are clearly predecisional and deliberative. They were created before the DOE adopted a final position on the geothermal proposals and consist of personal opinions which reflect the consultative process. Furthermore, we note that the release of these reviews could inhibit consultants from expressing their candid views if they believed that those views could become public knowledge. As such, the documents at issue are precisely the sort of documents which exemplify the deliberative and "group thinking" processes Exemption 5 is designed to protect. Sears, 421 U.S. at 153 (quoting Davis, The Information Act: A Preliminary Analysis, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 761, 797 (1967)). Accordingly, we hold that the reviews meet all the requirements for withholding material under the Exemption 5 deliberative process privilege.

However, both the FOIA and the implementing DOE regulations require that non-exempt material which may be reasonably segregated from withheld material be released to a requester. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(c). See Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 89 (1972); Boulder Scientific Company, 19 DOE ¶ 80,126 at 80,577 n.3 (1989). Exemption 5 only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. Factual information contained in the protected document must be disclosed unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971). There is no indication in Golden's determination letter that it considered this principle before withholding the reviews in full. Furthermore, after reviewing the documents ourselves, it appears that there may be some factual material which is non-exempt and reasonably segregable. Thus, we shall remand this case to Golden with instructions to review the requested documents and to release any reasonably segregable factual material or to issue a new determination explaining why this material should not be released.

III. Public Interest Determination

The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In this case, no public interest would be served by release of the comments and recommendations contained in the reviews of the geothermal energy proposals, which consist solely of the preliminary views and recommendations provided to DOE employees in the consultative process. The release of this deliberative material could have a chilling effect upon the agency. The ability and willingness of persons consulted by DOE employees to make honest and open recommendations concerning similar matters in the future could well be compromised. If consultants were inhibited in providing information and recommendations, the agency would be deprived of the benefit of their open and candid opinions. This would stifle the free exchange of ideas and opinions which is essential to the sound functioning of DOE programs. Fulbright & Jaworski, 15 DOE ¶ 80,122 at 80,560 (1987). Consequently, we conclude that release of the withheld material protected under Exemption 5 would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the deliberative process privilege. See Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (stating that the Department of Justice will defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption).

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, the OHA finds that Golden properly applied the threshold requirements of Exemption 5 to the reviews of the geothermal proposals, and that there is no public interest in the release of any portion of the proposals that reflect the preliminary views and recommendations of their consultants. However, we are remanding this matter to Golden to issue a new determination, either releasing reasonably segregable factual material or explaining the reasons for withholding any factual material contained in the reviews.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by FAS Engineering Incorporated on March 3, 1998, Case Number VFA-0375, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Golden Field Office, which should issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: David R. Berg

Date of Filing: February 10, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0376

On February 10, 1998, David R. Berg filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him by the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "HR"). This determination was issued in response to a request for information submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Parts 1004 and 1008, respectively.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

The Privacy Act permits individuals to gain access to their records or to information pertaining to them that is contained in systems of records maintained by the agencies. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(1).

I. Background

On February 26, 1997, Mr. Berg requested, under the provisions of the FOIA and the Privacy Act, that he be provided with all documents relating to a conversation between himself and another individual. Mr. Berg specifically requested access to four documents written by employees of the Waste Policy Institute, a DOE contractor, and the DOE.

HR issued a determination on May 28, 1997, in which it stated that it had located a number of documents responsive to Mr. Berg's request in the files denominated "DOE-2 DOE Personnel: Supervisor-Maintained Personnel Records," a system of records that is subject to the Privacy Act. However, HR withheld these documents in their entirety, citing subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(5), and Exemptions 5, 6 and 7 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), (b)(6) and (b)(7).

On July 16, 1997, Mr. Berg appealed HR's May 28, 1997 determination. In a Decision and Order dated August 14, 1997, the OHA found that HR had not adequately explained its reasons for withholding the documents under the FOIA and the Privacy Act and had not segregated and released non-exempt material. We therefore remanded this matter to HR with instructions to either release the documents in their entirety or issue a new determination letter to Mr. Berg. See David R. Berg, 26 DOE ¶ 80,210 (1997) (Berg I).

Subsequent to this Decision and Order, HR issued a new determination to Mr. Berg on January 7, 1998. In this determination, HR released two documents in redacted form, and withheld other documents in their entirety. The withheld material pertains to allegations of improper or threatening workplace behavior by Mr. Berg. In support of its actions, HR cited subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act and Exemptions 6, 7(C) and 7(F) of the FOIA. Subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act states that the Act is not applicable to information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding. Exemption 6 of the FOIA protects from mandatory disclosure personnel, medical and similar files that, if disclosed, would result in a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. FOIA Exemptions 7(C) and 7(F) encompass information compiled for law enforcement purposes that, if released, could reasonably be expected to result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy or would endanger the physical safety any individual, respectively.

On February 10, 1998, Mr. Berg filed the current Appeal. (1) In his submission, he claims that HR's determination on remand "ignor(es)" our August 14 Decision and Order by "simply refusing to provide the identified documents." Brief at 2. Mr. Berg further contends that subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act is inapplicable because it refers only to information compiled for a civil action or proceeding by an attorney or someone acting at an attorney's behest. With regard to HR's findings under the FOIA, Mr. Berg argues that the withheld material is not protected from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 6 because the individuals involved have no viable privacy interest in that material, and that Exemptions 7(C)and 7(F) are inapplicable because there is no law enforcement proceeding at issue in this case.

II. Analysis

A. HR's Compliance with Berg I

As a preliminary matter, Mr. Berg contends that HR's determination on remand does not address the deficiencies that we discussed in Berg I. We do not agree. In fact, we find that HR's January 7, 1998 determination is in full compliance with our instructions in Berg I. As previously stated, we found HR's earlier determination to be deficient because it "merely restated the languages of Exemptions 5, 6, and 7 as well as subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act, without adequately explaining" the manner in which HR applied those provisions in withholding the documents in question. Berg I. We further found that HR had made no apparent attempt to segregate and release non-exempt material. Id.

In contrast, the January 7 determination fully explains HR's application of the relevant statutory provisions to the matter at hand. For example, in explaining its decision to withhold the requested material pursuant to subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act, HR stated that formal or informal proceedings to remedy complaints of individuals who consider themselves aggrieved by a coworker's conduct are initiated by written complaints such as those sought by Mr. Berg. HR further found that individuals bringing such complaints, such as the authors of some of the documents requested by Mr. Berg, do so in reasonable anticipation that some type of proceeding to resolve the complaint will result. January 7 Determination Letter at 1-2. We find that HR has adequately explained its reasons for denying Mr. Berg's request. Furthermore, we have examined the withheld material, and we conclude that HR has adequately segregated and released any non- exempt material to Mr. Berg. We therefore reject Mr. Berg's claim that HR has failed to follow the guidelines that we set forth in Berg I.

B. The Privacy Act

Mr. Berg also argues that HR improperly withheld the responsive documents under subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act. That subsection states, in pertinent part, that "nothing in this section shall allow an individual access to any information compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d)(5).

Specifically, Mr. Berg contends that subsection (d)(5) is coextensive with the attorney work product privilege of Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Consequently, he argues, the subsection applies only to material compiled by an attorney or someone acting at the direction of an attorney. Since HR does not claim that the documents that it withheld were compiled by or under the direction of an attorney, Mr. Berg claims that subsection (d)(5) is not applicable. Moreover, he points out that the attorney work product privilege protects only those documents that would not normally or routinely be discoverable in civil proceedings. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 154-155 (1975). Therefore, since the withheld documents would be discoverable in any disciplinary proceeding against him, he contends, those documents may not be withheld under subsection (d)(5). In support of his position, Mr. Berg cites Martin v. Office of Special Counsel, MSPB, 819 F.2d 1181 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (Martin). In that case, the court upheld the denial of Martin's request under the FOI and Privacy Acts for access to certain documents that were prepared by a government attorney during the investigation of Martin's claims of workplace harassment. In reaching this result, the court found the documents to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 5 of the FOIA and subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act.

However, contrary to Mr. Berg's assertions, the Martin court did not find subsection (d)(5) to be coextensive with the attorney work product privilege. Indeed, in discussing the "deliberative process" civil discovery privilege, the court said that "[u]nlike FOIA Exemption (b)(5), Exemption (d)(5) in no way incorporates civil discovery law..." Martin at 1187. Similarly, in Hernandez v. Alexander, 671 F.2d 402 (10th Cir. 1982), the court rejected a claim that subsection (d)(5) only exempts material that falls within the attorney work product privilege, stating that the exemption "is not limited to an attorney's work product, but extends to any records compiled by counsel or other persons in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding." Id. at 408 (citing Smietra v. Department of Treasury, 447 F. Supp. 221, 227-28 (D.D.C. 1978)). We therefore reject Mr. Berg's claim that subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act applies only to material that may be withheld under the attorney work product privilege.

Documents, such as those HR has withheld, that detail allegations of workplace misconduct often lead to civil suits or administrative disciplinary proceedings. Based on the circumstances of this proceeding, we conclude that the withheld material was compiled in reasonable anticipation of a civil action or proceeding within the meaning of subsection (d)(5), and was therefore properly withheld under this provision. See Robert B. Freeman, 26 DOE ¶ 80,180 (1997) (information is compiled in anticipation of civil action or proceeding within meaning of (d)(5) when prospect of such a civil action or proceeding is primary reason for compilation of information).

C. The FOIA

A finding that the withheld documents are exempt under subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act does not end our inquiry. Unless the documents are also exempt from mandatory release under the FOIA, they must be released to Mr. Berg. Diane C. Larson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,112 (1996). As we previously stated, HR withheld the responsive documents pursuant to Exemptions 6, 7(C) and 7(F).

1. Exemption 6

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C.§ 552(b)(6); 10 C. F. R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

In order to determine whether information may be withheld under Exemption 6, an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to Exemption 6. Ripskis v. Department of HUD, 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the government. See Hopkins v. Department of HUD, 929 F.2d 81, 88 (2d Cir. 1991); Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749 (1989) (Reporters Committee); FLRA v. Department of Treasury Financial Management Service, 884 F.2d 1446, 1451 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 864 (1990). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 762-770.

In his appeal, Mr. Berg contends that because the events that form the basis for the complaints against him occurred in the workplace, the complainants have no cognizable privacy interest in the withheld material. We do not agree. While it is true that the complainants have little or no privacy interests regarding their involvement in the workplace events underlying their allegations, we find that they retain a significant privacy interest in maintaining the confidentiality of their participation in actions against Mr. Berg's interests. As an initial matter, the complaints against Mr. Berg were captioned "Administratively Confidential." It is therefore evident that the complainants had a reasonable expectation that their communications would not be made public. Moreover, individuals who file complaints about co-workers could be subjected to harassment, retaliation or emotional distress if their identities were made public. See, e.g., Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1995) (McKinney); Valley Times, 23 DOE ¶ 80,154 at 80,632 (1993); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1991).

In contrast, we find that the public interest in the release of this material is negligible, because such a release would not contribute in any meaningful way to the public's understanding of the manner in which its government operates. We therefore conclude that release of the documents would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, and that HR properly withheld them pursuant to Exemption 6.

2. Exemptions 7(C) and 7(F)

HR also cited Exemptions 7(C) and 7(F) in withholding the responsive documents. Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . (C) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). Exemption 7(F) permits an agency to withhold records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes "if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to endanger the life or physical safety of any individual." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(F); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(vi). We find that Exemptions 7(C) and 7(F) do not apply in this case.

The threshold requirement in any Exemption 7 inquiry is whether the documents are compiled for law enforcement purposes, i.e. as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. See F.B.I. v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982); William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996). An organization withholding material under Exemption 7 must have statutory authority to enforce a violation of a law or regulation within its authority. Church of Scientology v. Department of the Army, 611 F.2d 738, 748 (9th Cir. 1979) (remand to Naval Investigative Service to show that investigation involved enforcement of statute or regulation within its authority). For example, we have consistently found that the DOE's Office of the Inspector General (IG) compiles reports for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7. See Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1997) ("The IG is a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate."); Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1997); William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996); McKinney. Applying these principles to the matter at hand, we find no indication in the record that HR has the "requisite law enforcement mandate" to invoke the protection of Exemption 7. See, e.g., Church of Scientology International v. IRS, 995 F.2d 916, 919 (9th Cir. 1993) (law enforcement mandate provided by enforcement provisions of federal tax code). Without evidence of such a statutory foundation, we cannot conclude that the withheld documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we find that HR properly applied subsection (d)(5) of the Privacy Act and Exemption 6 of the FOIA. We further conclude that HR segregated and released all non-exempt material to Mr. Berg. His appeal will therefore be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by David R. Berg on February 10, 1998 is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0377, 27 DOE ¶ 80,117

March 10, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Dr. Nicolas Dominguez

Date of Filings:February 10, 1998

Case Numbers:VFA-0377

VFA-0379

On February 10, 1998, Dr. Nicolas Dominguez filed Appeals from three determinations the Authorizing Official of the Oak Ridge Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him on January 6, 1998. In those determinations, the Authorizing Official partially granted requests for information that Dr. Dominguez filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In his October 21, 1997, November 2, 1997 and November 30, 1997 requests for information, Dr. Dominguez sought copies of the following documents:

(1) the monthly reports entitled “CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM” from January 1995 to October 1997 and for “upcoming” months;

(2) documents concerning interviews Peter Johnson conducted;

(3) documents concerning interviews Patricia Howse-Smith conducted;

(4) a document entitled “Employee Concerns Management System”;

(5) a notebook Lockheed Martin management allegedly prepared and used in a meeting with Dr. Dominguez on July 21, 1997; and

(6) a document with the names of the witnesses from which a “group of peers” of Dr. Dominguez heard testimony on July 21, 1997.

In her determinations, the Authorizing Official released copies of the following documents:

(1) the “CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM” reports from January 1997 through October 1997;

(2) all records contained in the “Employee Concerns Management System” pertaining to Employee

Concern 97-10, including interview notes; and

(3) the DOE Order 5480.29 Employee Concerns Management System and an explanation of the program found in the DOE Oak Ridge Employee Handbook.

The Authorizing Official stated that the "CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM" reports generated prior to January 1997 no longer exist. Specifically, she stated that the DOE destroys these reports after 18 months, and since the DOE revised the database used to create these reports, she can no longer retrieve reports created prior to January 1997. With regard to the reports for "upcoming" months, the Authorizing Official stated that the DOE cannot provide information that it has not yet generated. Finally, the Authorizing Official stated that no agency records exist regarding the Lockheed Martin notebook or the document alleged to contain names of witnesses.

Dr. Dominguez makes the following arguments in his Appeals:

(1) The Authorizing Official did not provide all of the "CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM" reports that exist. Specifically, he states that the DOE did not provide reports from March, May and August 1997 and June through December 1996.

(2) Dr. Dominguez reiterates his request for more information from interviews Peter Johnson and Patricia Howes-Smith conducted.

(3) Dr. Dominguez states that David Rupert, the Director of Lockheed Martin's Oak Ridge Office of Workforce Diversity, informed him that the notebook Lockheed Martin prepared with taxpayer money would be kept permanently in Mr. Rupert's office.

Analysis

A. Adequacy of the Search

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the Appeal, we contacted the Authorizing Official to ascertain the validity of Dr. Dominguez's contention that the Authorizing Official did not send him all of the available "CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM" reports. The Authorizing Official informed us that the DOE generated these reports monthly beginning in June 1997. However, prior to June 1997, the DOE did not issue these reports in every month. For one month, March 1997, a report does not exist because the DOE never generated a report in that particular month. In another report, the DOE combined two months, May and June 1997, into a single report. Furthermore, the Authorizing Official confirmed that the DOE sent to Dr. Dominguez all of the reports in existence at the time of his request.

Additionally, the Authorizing Official stated that the data in the reports the DOE provided to Dr. Dominguez include data for the time beginning January 4, 1996 to the date of each particular report. However, as stated above, reports created prior to January 1997 no longer exist. Thus, the Authorizing Official stated that the DOE provided to Dr. Dominguez a complete set of data from the "CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM." Since Dr. Dominguez states that he did not receive reports for May 1997 and August 1997, we will require the DOE to provide Dr. Dominguez with new copies of the May/June 1997 and August 1997 "CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM" reports.

With regard to the documents concerning interviews Peter Johnson and Patricia Howse-Smith conducted, the Authorizing Official stated that she inspected every document in the employee concerns investigation file. This employee concerns investigation file duplicates files located in the offices of Rufus Smith, Patricia Howse-Smith, and Patricia Taylor (the FOIA contact who gathered information from Peter Johnson), and she confirmed from this search that the DOE does not have any additional responsive documents. However, the Authorizing Official stated that due to an oversight, the DOE did not release a document responsive to Dr. Dominguez's request. The DOE has agreed to provide Dr. Dominguez a copy of the "Employee Concerns Management System" guide.

B. Agency Records

Dr. Dominguez contends that the notebook Lockheed Martin prepared is an "agency record" because the Director of the Oak Ridge Office of the Workforce Diversity, David R. Rupert, told him that the notebook would be kept permanently at Oak Ridge. The Authorizing Official has confirmed that Mr. Rupert is an employee of the DOE contractor, Lockheed Martin Energy Research Corporation, and that Mr. Rupert compiled the notebook for use in an internal employee matter between Lockheed Martin and its employee, Dr. Dominguez.

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether the notebook and witness list are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f) (describing the scope of the term "agency" under the FOIA). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and that they are also not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as Lockheed Martin, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, Lockheed Martin is the contractor responsible for maintaining and operating the Oak Ridge Operations Office. While the DOE obtained Lockheed Martin's services and exercises general control over the contract work, it does not supervise Lockheed Martin's day-to-day operations. See Contract No. DE-AC05-960R22464. We therefore conclude that Lockheed Martin is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although Lockheed Martin is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, its records relevant to Mr. Dominguez's request could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time Dr. Dominguez made his FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, we have determined that the notebook and list of witnesses Dr. Dominguez seeks were not in the agency's control at the time of the appellant's request.(1) Based on these facts, these documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

We therefore next look to the contract between DOE and Lockheed Martin to determine the status of the requested records. That contract generally states, Except as is provided in paragraph (b) of this clause, all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government . . .

Contract No. DE-AC05-960R22464, Section H.22 (a). Paragraph (b)(4) of the ownership of records section of the contract states that the excluded category of Contractor's records includes "Employee relations records and files . . . pertaining to . . . [i]nternal complaints, grievance records, . . . [a]rbitration proceedings, . . . [a]llegations, investigations and resolution of employee misconduct . . . ." Since the notebook and document alleged to contain names of witnesses that Dr. Dominguez requests are records the contract states are Contractor records, we find that the records sought by the appellant are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA nor subject to release under the DOE regulations. Accordingly, we must deny this portion of Dr. Dominguez's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal Dr. Nicolas Dominguez filed on February 10, 1998, Case No. VFA-0377, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Authorizing Official of the Oak Ridge Operations Office of the Department of Energy, who will release copies of the May/June 1997 and August 1997 "CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEE COMPLAINT TRACKING SYSTEM" reports or provide a detailed explanation for withholding.

(3) The Appeals Dr. Nicolas Dominguez filed on February 10, 1998, Case Nos. VFA-0378 and VFA-0379, are hereby denied.

(4) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0380, 27 DOE ¶ 80,188

February 17, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:National Security Archive

Date of Filing:February 11, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0380

The National Security Archive filed an Appeal from a determination that the Department of Energy's Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division (the FOIA Office) issued to it on January 22, 1998. In that determination, the FOIA Office denied in part a request for information that the National Security Archive filed on March 4, 1994, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. The information deleted from the documents released to the National Security Archive in that determination was withheld after the Department of Energy's Office of Declassification reviewed the documents to determine whether they contained classified information. This Appeal, if granted, would require the FOIA Office to release the information that it withheld in its January 22, 1998 determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On March 4, 1994, William Burr of the National Security Archive submitted a request under the FOIA to the Department of Energy (DOE) for copies of any reports prepared between September 1, 1961, and December 31, 1962, that analyzed the significance of the nuclear test series the Soviet Union conducted during the late summer and fall of 1961. The DOE identified 15 responsive documents. It determined that two of them could be released in their entirety and the remaining 13 documents could be released after extensive deletions were made. The deleted information was withheld because the DOE determined it to be classified as National Security Information pursuant to Executive Order 12958 and as Restricted Data pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemptions 1 and 3, respectively, of the FOIA.

The present Appeal seeks the disclosure of the withheld portions of the requested documents. In its Appeal, the National Security Archive contends that release of at least some of those portions could no longer reasonably be expected to cause damage to the national security, particularly since Russia has itself released information about its 1961 tests.

II. Analysis

Exemption 1 of the FOIA provides that an agency may exempt from disclosure matters that are "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1). Executive Order 12958 is the current Executive Order that provides for the classification, declassification and safeguarding of national security information. When properly classified under this Executive Order, national security information is exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 1. See National Security Archive, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Keith E. Loomis, 25 DOE ¶ 80,183 (1996); A. Victorian, 25 DOE ¶ 80,166 (1996). According to the Office of Declassification, the information withheld pursuant to Exemption 1 in this case relates to intelligence sources, methods, and activities, which is protected by Section 1.5(c) of the Executive Order and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA.

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., National Security Archive, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990). According to the Office of Declassification, the portions that the DOE deleted from the requested documents under Exemption 3 were withheld because they contain information about nuclear weapons design that has been classified as Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure.

The Director of Security Affairs (SA) has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of SA reviewed those portions of the requested document for which the DOE had claimed exemptions from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA.

In performing his review the Director of SA determined that the withheld material falls into three categories: yields of the Soviet nuclear tests, weapon design information, and intelligence matters. The following determinations were reached in consideration of the National Security Archive's contentions that the passage of time and the release of similar information by Russia have reduced the harm to the national security of the release of the information requested in this case. The DOE has re-evaluated the justification for classifying the withheld information under current classification guidance and determined that information related to the total yields of the Soviet tests, as well as some of the nuclear weapon design information, may now be released. Nevertheless, the DOE has determined that the information in those categories that continues to be withheld remains classified as Restricted Data. Moreover, the DOE has determined that one short phrase related to intelligence activities continues to be classified under the Executive Order. In addition, the vast remainder of the information concerning intelligence sources and methods has been reviewed by the Air Force Air Intelligence Agency, which has determined on appeal that the information remains sensitive and must continue to be withheld under the Executive Order. The denying official for the information that the Air Force continues to find necessary to withhold is James M. Enger, USAF, Director of Information Operations, Headquarters, Air Intelligence Agency.

Based on the review performed by the Director of SA, we have determined that Executive Order 12958 and the Atomic Energy Act require the continued withholding of some of those portions of the 13 documents that were previously identified as containing classified information. Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information, nevertheless such consideration is not permitted where, as in the application of Exemptions 1 and 3, the disclosure is prohibited by statute or Executive Order. Therefore, those portions of the documents that the Director of SA has now determined to be properly classified must be withheld from disclosure. However, because some previously deleted information may now be released as a result of the Director of SA's review, newly redacted versions of the 13 documents will be provided to the National Security Archive under separate cover. Accordingly, the National Security Archive's Appeal will be granted in part and denied in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the National Security Archive on February 11, 1998, Case No. VFA- 0380, is hereby granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) Newly redacted versions of 13 documents responsive to its March 4, 1994 Freedom of Information Act request, in which additional information is released, will be provided to the National Security Archive.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Masako Matsuzaki

Date of Filing: February 11, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0381

On February 11, 1998, Masako Matsuzaki (Matsuzaki) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her in response to a request for documents she submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. The DOE's Richland Operations Office (DOE/RL) issued the determination on December 31, 1997. This Appeal, if granted, would require that DOE/RL perform another search for responsive documents.

I. Background

Matsuzaki states that she is a retired Army nurse who was stationed at the Hanford site in Richland, Washington between 1959 and 1961. She alleges that she was exposed to radiation at Hanford, and is suffering severe medical problems today as a result of this exposure. On September 30, 1997, Matsuzaki filed a request with DOE/RL for proof that she was stationed at the Hanford Site with the U.S. Army, and that while stationed at Hanford she was exposed to radiation. Letter from Matsuzaki to DOE/RL (September 30, 1997). DOE/RL responded that all records pertaining to military personnel stationed at Hanford were sent to Fort Lewis, Washington. Letter from DOE/RL to Matsuzaki (December 31, 1997) (Determination Letter). Unfortunately, a fire in the 1970s destroyed many of the military records stored at Fort Lewis, including retired military personnel identification. Nonetheless, DOE/RL conducted a search of its three main Privacy Act systems of records (employment, medical and radiation exposure) and found no records pertaining to Matsuzaki. Determination Letter. On February 11, 1998, Matsuzaki filed this Appeal. She argues that even though her military records were sent to Fort Lewis, the DOE possesses information that it has not disclosed to her. Letter dated February 11, 1998, from Matsuzaki to DOE's Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA).

II. Analysis

The Privacy Act requires each federal agency to, inter alia, permit an individual to gain access to information about that individual which is contained in any "system of records" maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d); 10 C.F.R. § 1008.6(a)(2). Information that is exempt from disclosure under the Privacy Act must be released to a requester unless it is also exempt from disclosure under the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(t)(2). Thus, it is the general practice of the DOE to process a request by an individual for information about that individual under both the Privacy Act and the FOIA. See David R. Berg, 26 DOE ¶ 80,210 (1997).

A Privacy Act request requires only a search of systems of records, rather than a search of all agency records, as is required under the FOIA. Nevertheless, the standard of sufficiency that we demand of a Privacy Act search is no less rigorous than that of a FOIA search. Therefore, we will analyze the adequacy of DOE/RL's Privacy Act search using principles that we have developed under the FOIA. See Diane Larson, 26 DOE ¶ , Case No. VFA-0367 (February 17, 1998); Anibal L. Taboas, 25 DOE ¶ 80,207 at 80,775 (1996).

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552; 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In responding to a request for information under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents. Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995); Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

Matsuzaki challenges the adequacy of DOE/RL's search for documents responsive to her request. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Matsuzaki and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (February 19, 1998). However, Matsuzaki has admitted that she is aware that Hanford military records were sent to Fort Lewis. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Matsuzaki and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (February 19, 1998). In fact, she stated that she contacted an Army records center in Missouri, and they informed her of the fire at Fort Lewis. Id. Despite this information, we contacted DOE/RL to determine if any other records located at that office could contain responsive material. DOE/RL had indeed considered searching other Privacy Act systems of records (for example, Emergency Locator Records, Payroll and Leave Records, Firearms Qualifications, and EEO Complaints) as well as all other agency records under the FOIA. Memoranda of Telephone Conversations between Angela Lowman, DOE/RL and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (March 2, 1998 and March 5, 1998). However, because all records of military personnel stationed at Hanford had been transferred to Fort Lewis, DOE/RL concluded that it would be unlikely to locate any responsive material in agency files. Id.

Therefore, we find that DOE/RL has conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover the requested information. Even though military records are not stored at Hanford, the agency conducted a conscientious search of the systems of records most likely to contain information related to Matsuzaki's tour of duty at Hanford. Accordingly, the Appeal is hereby denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Masako Matsuzaki on February 11, 1998, Case Number VFA-0381, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Eugene Maples

Date of Filing: March 2, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0382

On March 2, 1998, Eugene Maples completed the filing of an Appeal from determinations the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) and the Office of General Counsel (OGC) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued on January 6 and 20, 1998, respectively. (1) The OIG determination, while releasing several responsive documents, also withheld information in a document responsive to a Request for Information (Request) which Mr. Maples submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The OGC determination provided several responsive documents to Mr. Maples pursuant to his FOIA Request. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the information OIG withheld as well as order OIG and OGC to conduct additional searches for responsive documents.

The FOIA requires that agency records that are held by a covered branch of the federal government, and that have not been made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). The FOIA also lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure will nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

BACKGROUND

In his March 4, 1997 FOIA Request to DOE Headquarters, Mr. Maples requested copies of all correspondence relating to the administrative recoupment of Petroleum Violation Escrow (PVE) funds, between the following parties:

(1) the DOE and the Governor's Office or Attorney General's Office of South Carolina;

(2) the DOE and the DOE's Atlanta Support Office as well as correspondence to Washington, D.C., regarding any PVE funds; and

(3) the DOE, the DOE's Office of General Counsel, the Department of Justice and the State of South Carolina;

March 4, 1997 Request Letter from Eugene Maples to GayLa D. Sessoms, Director, Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division, DOE Headquarters (Request Letter), at 1. Mr. Maples also requested that the DOE provide copies of all correspondence "assuring that any [PVE] funds ordered to be recovered are in fact being recovered as directed by DOE." Id. at 2. (2)

The Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Division referred Mr. Maples' Request to OIG and OGC. Responding to Mr. Maples' Request in a determination letter dated January 6, 1998, OIG released five documents to Mr. Maples. The OIG released all five documents in their entirety, except for a memorandum dated March 31, 1995, in which the OIG withheld three names in the attachment block of the memorandum. (3) OIG stated that it withheld the names pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C) of the FOIA. In a determination letter dated January 20, 1998, OGC released a number of documents in their entirety to Mr. Maples. In his Appeal, Mr. Maples challenges the adequacy of the search that OIG and OGC used to locate responsive documents. Mr. Maples also challenges OIG's withholding of the names under Exemptions 6 and 7(C). (4)

A. EXEMPTIONS 6 and 7(C)

Exemptions 6 and 7(C) allow the withholding of information dealing with personal privacy. The former permits the non-disclosure of "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). Under Exemption 7(C), agencies may withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of a personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). Both of these exemptions require balancing the interest in personal privacy in the withheld information against the public interest in the same information. There are, however, two significant differences between Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Under Exemption 7 (C), the information must have been compiled for law enforcement purposes. In addition, because information may be withheld where there is merely a reasonable expectation of an "unwarranted invasion of a personal privacy," there is a lower threshold of privacy interest employed in Exemption 7(C) than in Exemption 6, where the balance calls for information to be withheld only if there is a "clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy" (emphasis added).

The document from which the names were withheld is a memorandum dated March 31, 1995, from the Chief Financial Officer of DOE to the DOE Inspector General with an attached Departmental Position on Inspector General Report ER-B-92-06 (March Memorandum). The March Memorandum states that "[a]s required by DOE Order 2320.2B . . . attached is the Departmental position on Inspector General Report ER-B-92-06 . . . ." Since the DOE created this memorandum to transmit the DOE's response to a completed OIG audit report pursuant to a DOE order, it would not appear that the OIG compiled the memorandum for law enforcement purposes. Consequently, we will remand this matter to OIG so that it may issue a new determination giving a more detailed explanation regarding whether it compiled the March Memorandum for "law enforcement purposes" as Exemption 7(C) requires.

On remand, OIG should also consider whether there exists any significant privacy interest in the withheld names to justify its application of Exemptions 6 and 7(C). OIG withheld all of the names in the attachment block of the March Memorandum except for the name of an OIG employee. As we have stated previously, a name by itself does not create a privacy interest that can be protected for the purposes of FOIA exemption analysis. The News Tribune, 25 DOE ¶ 80,181 at 80,700 (1996). Rather, the privacy interest exists when a name is linked with information that reveals something personal or private about an individual. Id. at 80,699. The names withheld appear to be names of DOE employees to whom a copy of the March Memorandum was sent. Federal employees carrying out their official duties have no privacy interest in having their names linked with another employee's work-product unless it reveals something personal or private about that individual or there are other special circumstances. See Maples. Consequently, since the withheld names appear to be listed in the attachment block as a part of their official duties, it does not appear that a privacy interest exists for the withheld names. On remand, OIG should determine, in light of the discussion above, whether Exemptions 6 and 7(C), or any other Exemption, are applicable to the withheld names and either release the withheld names or issue Mr. Maples another determination regarding any withheld names.

B. ADEQUACY OF THE SEARCH

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Mary Towles Taylor, 26 DOE ¶ 80,114 (1996). As discussed below, we have reviewed the search conducted by OIG and OGC and find that each office conducted a reasonable search for documents responsive to Mr. Maples' Request.

1. OIG

We contacted officials at OIG to ascertain the extent of the search conducted for responsive documents. See Memorandum of meeting between Jacqueline Becker and Sanford Parnes, OIG Counsel, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (March 4, 1998); Memorandum of telephone conversation between Jacqueline Becker and Linda Duvall, OIG, and Richard Cronin (March 10, 1998). OIG counsel informed us that when OIG received Mr. Maples' Request, it undertook a computer database search to try to identify files containing responsive documents.(5) The computer database, which can index OIG's files, was searched using the terms "Maples," "PVE," "South Carolina," "Governor of South Carolina," "Stripper Well," "Exxon," "Warner Amendment" and "Escrow Funds." OIG's computer index search identified two investigatory files pertaining to the South Carolina projects, and OIG provided all responsive documents to Mr. Maples. OIG officials also informed us that, because the two investigatory files had been closed, they have no expectation that responsive documents exist outside of those files. Given the facts OIG presented to us, we believe the search it conducted was a reasonable search for responsive documents. OIG searched its files using a computer database and located the files most likely to possess responsive documents. Further, OIG officials had no reason to believe that other responsive documents would exist in locations other than the identified investigatory files. OIG provided all responsive documents it located to Mr. Maples. Consequently, we believe that OIG conducted an adequate search for responsive documents.

Mr. Maples' argument to the contrary is unavailing. With regard to the OIG search, Mr. Maples asserts that while he has previously identified 22 State of South Carolina projects as being improperly funded with PVE funds, information exists stating that only six of the projects had either been terminated or were the subject of remedial action. Mr. Maples argues that there should exist additional information regarding recoupment of monies from the other 16 projects he previously identified. Mr. Maples also asserts that over 200 State of South Carolina projects may have been improperly funded in the same manner as the six projects as to which remedial action was taken. Mr. Maples argues that the OIG released no documents to him regarding recoupment of monies regarding any of those projects.

To investigate Mr. Maples' claim, we contacted officials at OIG. OIG informed us that it has no information or knowledge regarding recoupment of PVE funds other than with respect to the six projects referenced in Mr. Maples' Appeal. Additionally, OIG informed us that, because of the nature of the office, OIG officials would be aware of any effort to obtain recoupment of PVE funds. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Jacqueline Becker and Richard Cronin (March 12, 1998). Thus, notwithstanding Mr. Maples' allegations regarding the remaining 16 projects, the OIG had no reason to believe that correspondence exists regarding the recoupment of PVE funds for those projects or the 200 other State of South Carolina projects to which he referred. Given this information, we have no reason to believe that OIG possesses further responsive documents.

2. OGC

We contacted officials at OGC to inquire about their search for responsive documents. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Harold Goldsmith, OGC, and Richard Cronin (March 3, 1995); Memorandum of telephone conversation between Suzanne Odom, Special Assistant, Office of the General Counsel, and Richard Cronin (March 5, 1998). OGC stated that upon receipt of Mr. Maples' Request, it conducted a computer database search using the terms "South Carolina," "SC," "S. Car.," and "So. Car." (6) OGC examined the computer generated lists of files using these terms to determine if any of the files would have responsive documents. OGC discovered two potentially responsive documents and provided these documents to Mr. Maples. OGC contacted various individuals whose names Mr. Maples suggested to inquire if they had any further knowledge regarding the existence of responsive documents. OGC also contacted individuals it believed would most likely have knowledge regarding the existence of responsive documents. The OGC contacted the Department of Justice, the Assistant General Counsel for Federal Litigation, the Assistant General Counsel for the Office of Energy Efficiency and OHA to try to uncover information regarding the responsive documents. A number of the DOE officials informed OGC that if responsive documents exist they would be located at the Office of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy (EE). OGC officials then asked officials at EE to conduct a search. EE officials searched their files and determined that it had previously provided all of its responsive documents to Mr. Maples pursuant to an earlier FOIA request. (7) OGC also conducted a search of the correspondence of the General Counsel. Because the official from the DOE General Counsel's office was familiar with the inquiry regarding South Carolina's projects resulting from Mr. Maples' disclosures, she searched a computer database indexing the General Counsel's correspondence from 1990 to the present using the term "Maples." The official believed this term would most likely locate all responsive documents. Upon obtaining responsive documents using this search, she then searched the computer database using the name of the Department of Justice attorney referenced in the responsive documents. OGC then provided to Mr. Maples all responsive documents located in this manner.

Given this factual background, we believe that the search OGC conducted was reasonably calculated to discover responsive documents. OGC searched its files using a computer database to try to identify responsive documents. OGC then questioned the individuals at DOE most likely to have knowledge of responsive documents as well as individuals suggested by Mr. Maples. Upon discovering that EE might possess responsive documents, OGC asked EE to conduct a search. OGC also conducted a computer database search of the correspondence of the General Counsel's office. Consequently, we find that OGC's search for responsive documents was adequate.

Mr. Maples' argument that OGC did not conduct an adequate search is unpersuasive. As evidence that additional documents must exist within OGC, Mr. Maples refers to an undated and unsigned memorandum provided to him pursuant to his FOIA Request (Nordhaus Memorandum) indicating that then DOE General Counsel Robert Nordhaus recommended that officials at EE obtain "assurances from South Carolina that the Florence County project was selected using the appropriate State financial assistance regulations, including competitive requirements . . . ." Request Letter at 6 (citing Nordhaus Memorandum). Mr. Maples notes that none of the documents released to him contains assurances from the State of South Carolina regarding the Florence County project. Additionally, Mr. Maples also points out that the Nordhaus Memorandum also recommends "that the State of South Carolina provide the DOE with concrete written assurance that it will follow the State's financial assistance rules and regulations when managing and administering the State's Office of Energy Programs." Mr. Maples asserts that he did not receive any documents regarding such an assurance. In our inquiry of this appeal, we contacted an official with the DOE General Counsel's office who informed us that the Nordhaus Memorandum was an unsigned draft version of the memorandum. To the best of her knowledge, the DOE General Counsel never issued the Nordhaus Memorandum. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Suzanne Odom and Richard Cronin (March 5, 1998). Consequently, we believe that the existence of the Nordhaus Memorandum does not provide a reliable indication that other responsive documents may exist.

CONCLUSION

We will remand this Appeal to OIG so that it may release the withheld names on the March Memorandum or provide Mr. Maples another determination providing a more detailed justification for withholding the names. With regard to the search for responsive documents OIG and OGC conducted, we find that each office performed an adequate search. Consequently, Mr. Maples' Appeal will be granted in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Eugene Maples, OHA Case No. VFA-0382, is hereby granted in part as set forth in Paragraph (2) below, and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of the Inspector General for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: March 30, 1998

(1)Mr. Maples' initial submission did not contain the required copies of the determination letters from which he was appealing. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(b). We deemed Mr. Maples' appeal filed upon our receipt of the determination letters on March 2, 1998.

(2)PVE funds are monies the federal government collected from oil companies for violations of petroleum pricing regulations from 1973 to 1981. Funds not needed for direct restitution to injured persons are used to provide indirect restitution to overcharged customers. For this purpose, each state uses PVE funds to implement energy-related programs that benefit the citizens of that state. In 1993, Mr. Maples provided information to the OIG regarding the State of South Carolina's alleged misuse of PVE funds. See Eugene Maples, 26 DOE ¶ 80,159 (1997) (Maples).

(3)OIG identified one other document, originating with OGC, responsive to Mr. Maples' Request. OIG referred that document to OGC so that it could issue a determination regarding the document. In its January 20, 1998 determination letter, OGC released this document to Mr. Maples.

(4)Mr. Maples' submission reiterates his allegation that the State of South Carolina improperly managed PVE funds and requests that OHA direct OIG to make a more thorough investigation and audit of the State of South Carolina's wrongful use of federal funds. OHA does not have authority to order OIG to conduct an investigation. However, assuming arguendo that Mr. Maples has standing to request that OHA review the State of South Carolina's use of PVE funds and that such a review should be conducted, we examined the OIG investigatory files to determine if any further action should be contemplated regarding South Carolina's use of PVE funds. Cf. Denver Support Office, U.S. Dep't of Energy, A Report on State Expenditures of Oil Overcharges (1990) (OHA and Denver Support Office review of oil overcharge fund expenditures by 10 States prior to the enactment of Petroleum Overcharge Distribution and Restitution Act of 1986). These files indicate that there were some irregularities in the use of PVE funds by the State of South Carolina. Action was taken by DOE with regard to certain of these irregularities. Nevertheless, based on our review of the information contained in the files, we are not convinced that sufficient evidence exists for us to consider further action beyond that which DOE has already taken.

(5)At our request, OIG conducted another computer database search for responsive documents. OIG could find no additional responsive documents. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Jacqueline Becker and Linda Duvall, OIG, and Richard Cronin (March 10, 1998).

(6)The computer database used in the search contains listings for older Energy Regulatory Administration documents.

(7)At our request, EE conducted another search for responsive documents. EE again confirmed that it has already provided all responsive documents in its possession to Mr. Maples in earlier FOIA requests. See Memoranda of telephone conversations between Faith Lambert, EE, and Richard Cronin (March 5 and 9, 1998).

Case No. VFA-0384, 27 DOE ¶ 80,120

March 24, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant:Mary E. Burket

Date of Filing:February 24, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0384

This Appeal was filed by Mary E. Burket (the Appellant) under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) at 10 C.F.R. § 1004. The Appellant seeks the review of a determination letter that DOE's Office of General Counsel (GC) issued to her, which indicated that the DOE did not possess any documents responsive to a FOIA request she submitted. As explained below, we have determined that the present Appeal be denied.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. If a requester has reasonably described the information he or she is seeking and has complied with the DOE's FOIA regulations, the agency is obliged to conduct a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., National Resources Defense Council, 26 DOE ¶ 80,229 (1997); Acadian Gas Pipeline System, 26 DOE ¶ 80,160 (1997); James H. Stebbings, 25 DOE ¶ 80,177 (1996); Butler, Vines and Babb, PLLC, 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. United States Dep't of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1385 (8th Cir. 1985); accord, Weisberg v. United States Dep't of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Accordingly, we review the adequacy of an agency's search under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983).

The Appellant's original appeal requested any journals or logs concerning her father's involvement in the decontamination and decommissioning of the SL-1 reactor at the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory. Although the DOE did not locate any documents responsive to this request, it provided the Appellant with a related document that might be of interest to her.

On February 24, 1998, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, providing additional information which she believed might assist the DOE in locating responsive documents and requesting that the DOE conduct a further search for responsive documents.

We contacted Ms. Tonya Woods of Headquarters' Office of Freedom of Information and Privacy and Mr. Carl Robertson, FOIA Officer, Idaho Operation Office. Idaho had performed a name search on its records listing those individuals who were involved in the decontamination and decommissioning of the SL-1 reactor. GC's files were searched because the SL-1 reactor had been the subject of litigation.

These officials explained that an extensive search of Idaho's SL-1 decontamination and decommissioning files and the Office of General Counsel's files in Washington had been performed in response to the Appellant's request. However, no responsive documents had been located. These officials also indicated that the additional information provided by the Appellant would not likely lead to the location of additional responsive information.

We find that the search conducted by GC and Idaho was more than reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents. Accordingly, we find that this appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Mary E. Burket, Case Number VFA-0384, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0386, 27 DOE ¶ 80,123

April 2, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Dr. Nicolas Dominguez

Date of Filings:March 5, 1998

Case Numbers:VFA-0386

VFA-0387

VFA-0389

On March 5, 1998, Dr. Nicolas Dominguez filed Appeals from four determinations the Authorizing Official of the Oak Ridge Operations Office (ORO) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him on February 19, 1998. In those determinations, the Authorizing Official denied requests for information that Dr. Dominguez filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In his four February 11, 1998 requests for information, Dr. Dominguez sought copies of the following documents:

(1) a January 20, 1996 memo from Dr. Robert I. Van Hook, president of LMERC, to Dr. Dominguez (Case No. VFA-0387);

(2) an October 30, 1995 memo from Dr. Van Hook to Dr. Dominguez (Case No. VFA-0389);

(3) the written description for Dr. Dominguez' job as listed in a response to the Tennessee Human Rights Commission from Lockheed Martin Energy Research Corporation (LMERC), his employer (Case No. VFA-0386);

(4) documents concerning an LMERC "group of peers" to which Dr. Dominguez gave testimony on July 21, 1997.(1) The particular information sought regarding the "peers" was their full names, their titles and positions as of July 21, 1997, their current titles and positions, and their companies and divisions as of July 21, 1997 (Case No. VFA-0388).

The Authorizing Official stated that no agency records exist regarding any of these requests since LMERC owned each of the requested records and her search had not extended to the files of LMERC. Therefore, she denied the four requests. Dr. Dominguez responds that each of these LMERC documents was created using taxpayers' funds, and thus should be releasable under the FOIA.

Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether any of the requested records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f) (describing the scope of the term “agency” under the FOIA). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). Contrary to Dr. Dominguez’ unsupported assertion, not all taxpayer-funded records are subject to release under the FOIA. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that responsive “agency records” exist at ORO and that other portions of the requested records may be subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as LMERC, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595- 96.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976) (Orleans), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, LMERC is the contractor responsible for maintaining and operating the Oak Ridge Operations Office. While the DOE obtained LMERC’s services and exercises general control over the contract work, it does not supervise LMERC’s day-to-day operations. See Contract No. DE-AC05-960R22464. We therefore conclude that LMERC is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA. See Sheet Metal Workers’ International Association, 26 DOE ¶ 80,166 (1997).

Although LMERC is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, its records that are relevant to Dr. Dominguez’ request could be considered "agency records" if the DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time Dr. Dominguez made his FOIA requests. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989) (Tax Analysts); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, we have determined that, with one exception, none of the records Dr. Dominguez seeks was in the agency's control at the time of his requests.(2) See March 9, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. Based on these facts, these documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with the DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, the DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).(3) We therefore next look to the contract between the DOE and LMERC to determine the status of the requested records. That contract generally states,

Except as is provided in paragraph (b) of this clause, all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government . . .

Contract No. DE-AC05-960R22464, Section H.22 (a). Therefore, unless each of the requested items reasonably falls within the excluded categories of documents described in Paragraph (b), they will be considered the property of the DOE and potentially releasable under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e). We next examine those issues.

A. The Memos From Dr. Van Hook

Two of the requested items, the memos from Dr. Van Hook to Dr. Dominguez, fall within Paragraph (b)(4) of the ownership of records section of the contract. That provision excludes from government ownership the following items: “Employee relations records and files . . . pertaining to . . . [i]nternal complaints, grievance records, . . . [a]rbitration proceedings, . . . [a]llegations, investigations and resolution of employee misconduct, . . . [e]mployee discipline. . . [and] employee charges of discrimination . . . .” Since the memos are related to employment discrimination litigation between Dr. Dominguez and LMERC, Paragraph (b)(4) clearly applies. Moreover, these two memos are located only in LMERC’s employee relations files. See March 19, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. Accordingly, because LMERC owns the two memos, we find that the two memos are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA nor subject to release under the DOE regulations. Accordingly, we must deny the two Appeals concerning those memos, Case Nos. VFA-0387 and VFA-0389.

B. Dr. Dominguez’ Job Description

According to LMERC, the job description falls within Paragraphs (b)(4)(i), (b)(4)(ii), (b)(4)(v) and (b)(5) of the contract. See March 12, 1998 Letter from Robert M. Stivers, Jr., Associate General Counsel, Lockheed Martin Energy Systems, Inc., to Amy Rothrock. Additionally, ORO believes that the job description falls within Paragraph (b)(6) of the contract. See March 10, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. For the following reasons, we conclude that these records do not fall within any of the provisions of the contract delineating contractor-owned records.

First, Paragraph (b)(4)(i) refers to “[e]mployee relations records and files such as records and files pertaining to [q]ualifications or suitability for employment of any employee, applicant or former employee.” LMERC argues that the job description is used in evaluating an applicant’s suitability for a job or promotion as well as announcing job openings. However, we do not think it is reasonable to read the phrase “pertaining to” as broadly as LMERC does. Instead, we find that Paragraph (b)(4)(i) is referring to the unique qualifications of specific individuals, not the type of general information exemplified by a job description.

Second, Paragraph (b)(5) relates to “[r]ecords and files pertaining to wages, salaries and benefits and wage and salary benefit administration.” Although LMERC argues that it uses job descriptions to evaluate salaries and raises, we again believe this is not a reasonable reading and stretches Paragraph (b)(5) beyond its clear meaning. The paragraph is directed at financial data compiled on the amount of money and other benefits paid to each employee. To accept LMERC's definition would mean that any project an employee worked on could "pertain" to salary if that project led to a raise or demotion. We therefore cannot find that the meaning of "wages, salaries and benefits" encompasses LMERC's job descriptions.

Third, Paragraph (b)(6) covers "[p]rivileged or confidential Contractor financial information and correspondence between the Contractor, its financial institutions or other business segments of Contractor or its parent corporations . . . ." We believe that Paragraph (b)(6) does not apply to a job description. A job description is not related to financial information and correspondence.

Fourth, we acknowledge that LMERC has placed a copy of Dr. Dominguez' job description in the internal complaints, grievance records and employee discipline records mentioned in Paragraphs (b)(4)(ii) and (b)(4)(v) of the contract. However, the job description sought by Dr. Dominguez (and all other LMERC job descriptions) are also kept on file in the Personnel Office of LMERC. This file contains general information about types of jobs, and as discussed above, we find that it is unreasonable to conclude that this job description falls within any of the categories listed in Paragraph H.22(b) as records belonging to the contractor.

Since we conclude that the job description falls within Paragraph H.22(a) as a record that was "acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract," we believe that it is the property of the Government.(4) Thus, according to the last part of 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1), unless the records are exempt from disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), ORO must release the job description. Accordingly, we must remand Case No. VFA-0386 in order that ORO may either release the job description or issue a new determination to Dr. Dominguez explaining which FOIA exemption or exemptions are applicable to the material.

C. The "Group of Peers" Information

Dr. Dominguez requested the following information regarding the "group of peers" which heard testimony concerning his termination from LMERC:

(1) the names of the company and division within the company for each group member as of July 21, 1997;

(2) their full names; (5)

(3) their titles and positions as of July 21, 1997; and

(4) their current titles and positions.

1. The Companies and Divisions of the "Group of Peers"

ORO initially asserted that all of the requested "group of peers" information was withholdable because this material belonged to the contractor under Paragraph (b)(4) of the LMERC contract (which relates to employee concerns records), as well as Paragraph (b)(1) (which covers personnel files maintained on individual employees). Upon our inquiry, however, we learned that Ms. Rothrock was unaware that Dr. Dominguez had supplied with his FOIA request the names of the peers included in the "group of peers." See March 10 and 11, 1998 Records of Telephone Conversations between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein; March 11, 1998 electronic mail message from Amy Rothrock to Dawn L. Goldstein. The company and division of each LMERC employee is listed in the September 1997 phone book containing ORO and LMERC employees, which is located in the ORO reading room. Id.; March 24, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. Ms. Rothrock explained that since she now knows the peers' names, it is possible to release their companies and divisions. Therefore, she agreed to release copies of the relevant pages of the phone book showing the peers' companies and divisions. March 11, 1998 electronic mail message from Amy Rothrock to Dawn L. Goldstein.(6)

2. The Titles and Positions of the "Group of Peers"

According to ORO, because the peers' titles and positions are located within their personnel files, this information is not subject to release under DOE regulations. However, this argument fails to take account of the fact that other documents located at LMERC also contain the peers' titles and positions. According to ORO, it is in fact likely that the positions and titles of these five people are located in substantive documents owned by the DOE but possessed by LMERC. ORO also informed us that this information should be readily accessible. See March 17, 1998 Record of Meeting between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. We must therefore remand this aspect of Case No. VFA-0388 in order that ORO may conduct a search for responsive DOE-owned records that are in the possession of LMERC and therefore subject to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e). Responsive records would contain the current positions and titles and the July 1997 position and titles of the five people Dr. Dominguez named. If ORO locates responsive documents, it should either release them or issue a new determination to Dr. Dominguez explaining which FOIA exemption or exemptions are applicable to the material.

Conclusion

Thus, we are remanding Case No. VFA-0386 in order that ORO may either release Dr. Dominguez' job description or issue a new determination explaining which FOIA exemption or exemptions are applicable to the material. We are also remanding Case No. VFA-0388 in order that it may release the following items or issue a new determination explaining otherwise: the phone book pages containing the peers' companies and divisions; the responsive DOE-owned records possessed by LMERC containing the peers' titles and divisions both currently and as of July 1997; and the responsive agency records containing the full names of the "group of peers."

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeals filed by Dr. Nicolas Dominguez on March 5, 1998, Case Nos. VFA-0387 and VFA-0389, are hereby denied.

(2) The Appeals filed by Dr. Nicolas Dominguez on March 5, 1998, Case Nos. VFA-0386 and VFA-0388, are hereby granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (3) below and are denied in all other respects.

(3) Case Nos. VFA-0386 and VFA-0388 are hereby remanded to the Oak Ridge Operations Office, which shall promptly issue new determinations in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

(4) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: April 2, 1998

(1)1/ The "group of peers" heard testimony from Dr. Dominguez and others regarding his termination from LMERC and the reasons for that termination.

(2)2/ ORO informed us that it possesses documents listing the full names of the "group of peers" in records such as health records and personnel security records. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, ORO, and Dawn L. Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA (March 24, 1998). These records are responsive to Dr. Dominguez' request and therefore we must remand this aspect of Case No. VFA-0388 in order that ORO may either release the responsive records or issue a new determination to Dr. Dominguez explaining which FOIA exemption or exemptions are applicable to the material.

(3)3/ The regulation actually provides that the records must be exempt under 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(2). However, for several reasons, this Office has traditionally considered the restriction to Exemption 2 a typographical error and therefore read the provision as excluding all records covered by the FOIA exemptions. See, e.g., Los Alamos Study Group, 26 DOE ¶ 80,234 at 80,895 n. 3 (1997). First, it is our understanding that the DOE meant to exclude from this provision all records that are exempt under the FOIA, not just under Exemption 2. Second, Exemption 2 is little used, as compared with other FOIA exemptions, and it would be nonsensical to include this as the only exemption worth protecting in the DOE contractor records scheme. Last, our conclusion is further bolstered by the fact that 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(2) refers to 5 U.S.C. 552(b), as we believe Section 1004.3(e)(1) should have done. Accordingly, this Office reads 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1) as exempting all records covered by 5 U.S.C. 552(b).

(4)4/ Ms. Rothrock of ORO believes that the job description might have originated at Lockheed Martin Corporation's headquarters. See March 10, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. Even if this document did originate at the parent company of LMERC, Paragraph H.22(a) refers to all records LMERC acquired in its performance of this contract. Clearly, LMERC's use of Dr. Dominguez' job description in the course of its contract with the DOE would fall under H.22(a).

(5)5/ As explained above, because ORO possesses responsive agency records on this topic, we are remanding this aspect of Case No. VFA-0388.

(6)6/ We note that because this phone book is located in the ORO reading room as well as being placed online on the DOE web page, ORO would be entitled to direct Dr. Dominguez to locate this information in either of those places, rather than releasing this information to him in response to his FOIA request. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(2). However, in the interests of being customer-friendly, ORO has chosen to release those pages to him.

Case No. VFA-0390, 27 DOE ¶ 80,124

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Hobart T. Bolin, Jr.

Date of Filing: March 9, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0390

Hobart T. Bolin, Jr., files this Appeal under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (the Department) at 10 C.F.R. § 1004. The subject of the Appeal is a determination letter that the Department's Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) issued in response to Bolin's request for records pursuant to the FOIA. As explained below, we will grant the Appeal and remand this matter to OR to conduct a further search for documents responsive to Bolin's request.

In his FOIA request, dated November 1, 1997, Bolin asked for records regarding an incident that occurred on the Bethel Valley Project in 1995. Bolin specified that his request included, but was not limited to, the initial safety report, the final safety report, all bioassay test results from the time of the accident to the time he left his employment with a contractor of OR, and all investigative documents and results. He stated that the incident occurred in September 1995. OR responded by releasing several documents concerning Bolin's radiation exposure measurements, with a determination letter which noted that these documents constituted OR's final response to Bolin's request. Bolin then filed this Appeal, contending that OR had conducted an inadequate search for documents. As part of our review of Bolin's Appeal, we telephoned him. During the telephone conversation, Bolin acknowledged that the incident occurred in August 1995 rather than September 1995. In addition, he identified specific documents he thought he should have received, and provided the names of several individuals who might know the locations of these documents.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated often that an FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was, in fact, inadequate. E.g., National Resources Defense Council, 26 DOE ¶ 80,229 (1997).

We contacted the staff of the FOI office at OR and discussed Bolin's Appeal with them. Based on Bolin's clarifications and a review of the original search, the staff agreed to conduct a new search for documents. Therefore, we will remand this matter to OR so that it may conduct a further search for responsive documents. OR will release to Bolin any responsive documents that it locates, or will explain the basis for withholding any document or part of a documents it withholds, in a new determination letter, with specific reference to one or more of the exemptions from mandatory disclosure provided in the FOIA.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Hobart T. Bolin, Jr., Case Number VFA-0390, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0391, 27 DOE ¶ 80,125

April 10, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: William H. Payne

Date of Filing: March 13, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0391

On March 13, 1998, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received an Appeal that William H. Payne filed from a determination issued to him by the Director of the Office of Public Affairs at the Department of Energy's (DOE) Albuquerque Operations Office (hereinafter referred to as "the Director"). The Director issued his determination in response to a request for information under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would result in the release of additional documents to Mr. Payne.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document which is exempted from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In his request, Mr. Payne sought access to all invoices submitted to Sandia National Laboratories (SNL) between August 1, 1995 and August 14, 1997 by (i) law firms defending SNL in legal actions filed by "A. Morales," and (ii) any contractor for work done "involving the name of William H. Payne." In his response to Mr. Payne's request, the Director stated that 11 invoices had been identified as responsive to the request. The Director released the invoices in redacted form, withholding portions of these documents under Exemptions 4, 5 and 6 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4), (b)(5) and (b)(6). The Director further stated that subsequent to January 1997, the DOE had not retained any legal invoicesconcerning the Morales law suits. Consequently, any invoices submitted after that date would be in the legal files of SNL, and are therefore not "agency records" that would be subject to release under the FOIA. The Director then said that pursuant to DOE "policy, records in the possession and control of a DOE ... contractor, such as [SNL], will be made available by DOE [under the FOIA] when the contract specifically provides that such records are the property of the government." Determination letter at 1. The Director found that the contract between SNL and the DOE specifically provides that legal records such as those requested by Mr. Payne are the property of SNL, and are therefore not subject to release.

In his appeal, Mr. Payne does not contest the withholding under Exemptions 4, 5 and 6 of portions of the 11 invoices released to him. Instead, he contends that the post-January 1997 invoices are agency records that are subject to the FOIA. In this regard, he characterizes the DOE contractor records policy as one that "redesignat[es] a class of records from DOE-owned to contractor- owned," thereby shielding those records from the FOIA. Appeal at 2. He further argues that the policy was not adopted in accordance with the notice and comment rulemaking requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 551 et seq. (APA), and has therefore been declared invalid by the federal courts.(1)

II. Analysis

The appropriate test of whether a document is an agency record for purposes of the FOIA was set forth by the U.S. Supreme Court in Department of Justice vs. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-45 (1989). In that decision, the Court stated that documents are "agency records" for FOIA purposes if they (1) were created or obtained by an agency, and (2) are under agency control at the time of the FOIA request. The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch..., or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f).

Under these criteria, the post-January 1997 invoices involving the Morales lawsuits clearly are not agency records. They were generated by private law firms defending SNL in the Morales litigation, and not by agencies of the federal government or government-controlled corporations. Moreover, there is no indication in the record that the invoices in question were under DOE control at the time of Mr. Payne's request. The Director correctly concluded that these invoices are not agency records under the FOIA.

A finding that certain documents are not agency records, however, does not preclude the DOE from releasing them. "When a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor," unless those records are otherwise exempt from public disclosure. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). Accordingly, we have examined the contract between SNL and the DOE, and we conclude that under that agreement, SNL's legal files are the property of SNL, and are not subject to release under either the FOIA or the agency records regulation. Accord, William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,700 (1997).

Mr. Payne contends, however, that the DOE's contractor records policy narrows information access rights under the FOIA "by redesignating a class of records from DOE-owned to contractor- owned." He also contends that this policy is invalid because it was not adopted in accordance with the notice and comment rulemaking requirements of the APA.

We believe that these arguments reflect a misunderstanding of the effect and origin of 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). Contrary to Mr. Payne's assertions, this regulatory provision expands the scope of documents that are subject to disclosure. Under the Tax Analysts test, "agency records" must (i) have been originated or obtained by an agency, and (ii) be under an agency's control at the time of the FOIA request. However, pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1), contractor records that do not meet these criteria are still subject to disclosure as long as the contract between the contractor and the DOE provides that the records are government property. Moreover, 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1) was adopted in full compliance with the notice and comment requirements of the APA. On October 23, 1991, the DOE published this provision in proposed form. See 56 Fed. Reg. 55036. After receiving and considering 43 comments on the proposed regulation, the DOE adopted 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1) in final form. See 59 Fed. Reg. 63882 (December 12, 1994). We therefore reject Mr. Payne's arguments concerning the Director's application of that regulation.

III. Conclusion

The Director correctly determined that the post-1997 Morales invoices are not agency records, and are not subject to disclosure under the FOIA or under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). We will therefore deny Mr.

Payne's appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by William H. Payne on March 13, 1998 is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)Mr. Payne does not provide a citation for any case in which a federal court has declared the DOE's current contractor records policy to be invalid. However, in Committee to Bridge the Gap v. Department of Energy, Docket No. CV-90-3568-ER (C.D. Cal. October 15, 1991), the court found that the DOE's policy on contractor records constitutes a substantive rule under the APA, and that the DOE's treatment of contractor records should be promulgated through formal notice and comment rulemaking. Subsequent to this ruling, the DOE codified its contractor records policy at 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1), a regulatory provision that, as we discuss later, was adopted in accordance with the notice and comment requirements of the APA.

April 16, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Moore Brower Hennessy & Freeman, P.C.

Date of Filing: March 18, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0393

On March 18, 1998, Moore Brower Hennessy & Freeman, P.C. (Moore) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Idaho Operations Office (Idaho) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to Moore on February 19, 1998. That determination concerned a request for information submitted by Moore pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be required to release all responsive documents to Moore.

I. Background

This case presents the issue of whether records generated under a contract between DOE and a management and operating (M&O) contractor are agency records under the FOIA, and if not, whether those records are nonetheless subject to disclosure under DOE's regulation on contractor records, 10 C.F.R. Section 1004.3(e).

In 1993, M-K Ferguson, then M&O contractor (1) of the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory (INEL), awarded a construction contract to Caddell Construction Company, Inc. (Caddell). Caddell then awarded a subcontract to PKM Steel Services, Inc. (PKM). Moore, a law firm representing PKM, made a FOIA request in November 1996 for the disclosure of certain records relating to the construction project. Letter from Moore to FOIA Officer, Idaho (November 29, 1996). Idaho, with the assistance of LMITCO, sent Moore copies of various responsive documents. On August 26, 1997, Moore requested additional records related to the project. In September 1997, Idaho, again assisted by LMITCO, released further responsive material to Moore. However, due to the volume of the records requested, Idaho and Moore agreed to an on-site inspection of the material. In late January 1998, Idaho and Moore scheduled an on-site inspection of the remaining responsive documents to take place on February 25, 1998 at LMITCO's offices in Idaho.

However, prior to the inspection, LMITCO refused to cooperate with the disclosure of any additional documents. LMITCO informed Idaho that because PKM was in litigation(2) with LMITCO, LMITCO wanted to " shut down the FOIA process and disclose the requested documents under discovery in order to be fair to all the litigants against LMITCO." Letter from FOIA Officer, Idaho, to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, Staff Attorney, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (March 31, 1998) (Comment Letter). According to the FOIA Officer, LMITCO flatly refused to surrender the requested documents, which were in its physical control, and Idaho was unsuccessful in other attempts to obtain the records. Id. LMITCO also alleged that Moore was using the FOIA to supplement discovery.(3) Id.

In its determination letter, Idaho stated that " [because] LMITCO has been brought into the litigation with Caddell and PKM as a third party defendant . . . , and because the documents that have been subject to your FOIA request are in the possession of LMITCO and are not in the possession or under the control of the DOE, DOE is unable to proceed with providing documents . . . pursuant to the FOIA." Letter from FOIA Officer, Idaho, to Moore (February 19, 1998) (Determination Letter). Moore appealed to this Office, arguing that the FOIA Officer submitted no legal foundation for the denial of the request and that, under the contract, the requested records were DOE property. Letter from Moore to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (March 18, 1998) (Appeal). If granted, this Appeal would require Idaho to release all responsive records to Moore.

II. Analysis

The appropriate test of whether a document is an agency record for purposes of the FOIA was set forth by the U.S. Supreme Court in United States Department of Justice vs. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-45 (1989). In that decision, the Court stated that documents are "agency records" for FOIA purposes if they (1) were created or obtained by an agency, and (2) are under agency control at the time of the FOIA request. The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as agency records, they may still be subject to release under DOE regulations which state that:

"When a contract with DOE provides that documents acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. 552(b)."

10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1) (emphasis added). See also Dr. Nicolas Dominguez, 27 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1998); STAND of Amarillo, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,162 (1997).

Based on the M&O contract between LMITCO and DOE, we find that the records requested are not agency records, but that they are still subject to disclosure under DOE regulations. LMITCO, a privately owned and operated corporation, is clearly not an "agency" as that term is defined in the FOIA. See William Kuntz III, 25 DOE ¶ 80,157 (1995) (establishing that LMITCO is not an agency for FOIA purposes). In addition, the records were not under agency control at the time of the FOIA request. Thus the records are not subject to disclosure under the FOIA. Nevertheless, we find that the records are the property of the government and therefore subject to disclosure under DOE regulations unless exempt under the FOIA. The contract between LMITCO and DOE provides, in pertinent part, that:

(a) ... [E]xcept as provided in paragraph (b) of this clause ... , all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government and shall be delivered to the Government ... as the Contracting Officer may from time to time direct ....

(b) ... The following records ... are considered the property of the Contractor and are not within the scope of paragraph (a) above.

TO BE NEGOTIATED WITH MUTUAL AGREEMENT BETWEEN BOTH PARTIES DURING TRANSITION.

Contract NO. DE-AC07-94ID13223, Modification No. M0004, Section I.105.(4) Contracts between DOE and M&O contractors normally provide a detailed list of those records that are the property of the contractor. See, e.g., Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,205 (1997); STAND of Amarillo, Inc., 26 DOE ¶

80,162 (1997). The contract clearly states that all records acquired or generated in the performance of the contract are the property of the agency, unless specifically excluded. However, the contract has not identified any category of records as LMITCO property. Therefore, because the records that Moore requested are not identified in the contract as the property of LMITCO, we find that those documents requested are subject to disclosure under DOE regulations unless exempt under the FOIA. Since Idaho has already determined that the documents should be released to Moore, Idaho has no basis to now withhold the documents. As a DOE contractor, LMITCO knows that it is bound to comply with the agency's regulations, including § 1004.3(e), and cannot unilaterally elect to disregard them. See Contract No. DE-AC07-94ID13223, Modification No. M071 (August 3, 1994). The possibility that some of the documents may also be released through the discovery process to other parties in the litigation over the construction contract does not justify LMITCO's refusal to continue to make them available to Idaho in response to Moore's FOIA request.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on March 18, 1998, by Moore Brower Hennessy & Freeman, P.C., Case No. VFA-0393, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is remanded to the FOIA Officer of the Idaho Operations Office of the Department of Energy who shall make available all non-exempt portions of the requested material or issue a new determination adequately justifying continued non-disclosure of this information.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(3)LMITCO's contention that Moore is using the FOIA to circumvent, displace, or supplement discovery in the litigation over the construction project is irrelevant to the present appeal.

April 27, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Tamara L. Mix

Date of Filing: March 31, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0394

On March 31, 1998, Tamara L. Mix completed the filing of an Appeal from a final determination issued by the Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) of the Department of Energy (DOE) on February 18, 1998. (1) In its determination, OR informed Ms. Mix that it could not locate documents that were responsive to a request for information that Ms. Mix filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

BACKGROUND

During a February 1998 visit to the Oak Ridge Reading Room, Ms. Mix obtained a number of documents pertaining to community relations issues (such as land use and city planning) concerning the City of Oak Ridge and the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) during the late 1940s. In her request for information (sent via electronic mail) dated February 13, 1998 (Request), Ms. Mix requested various additional documents concerning community relations between the AEC and the City of Oak Ridge (Oak Ridge community relations documents). These documents were referenced in the documents she had obtained earlier in the Oak Ridge Reading Room. She also requested Oak Ridge community relations documents concerning the decision on where to locate a particular neighborhood. (2) In a determination letter dated February 18, 1998, OR stated that it had no responsive documents other than those which were provided to Ms. Mix in her earlier visit to the Oak Ridge Reading Room. In her Appeal, Ms. Mix challenges the adequacy of the search OR conducted for responsive documents.

ANALYSIS

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Dep't of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir.

We contacted the FOIA Officer at OR to inquire as to the nature of OR's search for responsive documents. See Memoranda of telephone conversations between Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, OR and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (April 16 and 17, 1998). She informed us that earlier in 1998, OR received a FOIA request from a different requester seeking similar documents. In response to that FOIA request, OR conducted a search at the National Archives facility at East Point, Georgia, the only facility known by OR to possess responsive documents. (3)OR copied and placed in its Reading Room all of the Oak Ridge community relations documents located at the National Archives facility. It provided these documents to Ms. Mix during her visit to the OR Reading Room. The FOIA Officer also informed us that to the best of her knowledge no other responsive community relations documents exist at OR or at the National Archives facility. In addition, she informed us that she is not aware of any other facility which might possess additional responsive documents.

Given the facts described above, we believe that OR's search was reasonably calculated to discover responsive documents. Pursuant to a similar prior request, OR searched the only facility it believes possesses responsive documents. OR provided Ms. Mix with all of the Oak Ridge community relations documents it discovered while responding to the similar prior request. Further, OR has no knowledge that responsive documents exist elsewhere. Because we find that OR's search was adequate, Ms. Mix's Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Tamara L. Mix on March 31, 1998, Case No. VFA-0394, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0395, 27 DOE ¶ 80,128

April 15, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Nuclear Control Institute

Date of Filing:March 18, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0395

On March 18, 1998, The Nuclear Control Institute (the Appellant) filed an Appeal from two determinations issued to it by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge) and Oakland Operations Office (Oakland). These determinations were issued in response to requests for information that the Appellant submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require that the withheld documents be released.

I. Background

This Appeal concerns two separate FOIA requests the Appellant originally filed with Oakland. The first request sought the minutes of three meetings among officials of DOE, Oak Ridge National Laboratories (ORNL) and contractors (the Minutes). Oakland referred this request to Oak Ridge. Oak Ridge issued a determination letter on November 14, 1997, withholding the Minutes in their entirety under the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5).

The second request was for a document entitled "Plutonium Disposition Study--Implementation of Weapons Grade MOX Fuel in Existing Pressurized Water Reactors" (the Report). This request was filed with Oakland and Oakland issued the January 13, 1998 determination letter withholding the Report in its entirety under the deliberative process privilege.

On March 18, 1998, the present Appeal was submitted claiming that Oakland and Oak Ridge have improperly withheld the documents under the deliberative process privilege.(1) Specifically, the Appeal contends that the withheld documents: (1) are not intra- or inter-agency documents, (2) are not predecisional; (3) are not deliberative; and (4) contain segregable factual information that Oakland and Oak Ridge failed to release.

II. Analysis

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release.

Exemption 5 exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). Among the privileges that fall under this exclusion is the executive or deliberative process privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980). In the present case, only the "deliberative process privilege" is at issue. The deliberative process privilege permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The purpose of the privilege is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for the deliberative process to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

i. Whether the Withheld Materials are Inter- or Intra- Agency Documents

The Appellant claims that since the withheld documents were not created by agency employees, they are not inter- or intra-agency documents. It is well settled, however, that many documents generated outside of agencies are withholdable under the deliberative process privilege. In order to determine whether documents generated outside of agencies are part of the deliberative process, the courts have employed a functional test. Under this functional approach, opinions and recommendations generated by outside consultants are considered part of the deliberative process if they were created pursuant to agency initiative in order to assist the agency in its decision making. See Formaldehyde Inst. v. HHS, 889 F.2d 1118, 1123-23 (D.C. Cir. 1989).

The Report is clearly part of DOE's deliberative process. The Report was authored by DOE contractors hired by the agency to make recommendations concerning the agency's future policies on the use of mixed oxide fuels (MOX) in commercial nuclear reactors. Similarly, the Minutes were prepared by a DOE contractor employee in order to memorialize discussions intended to aid the DOE in determining the feasibility of using MOX in commercial nuclear reactors. While recognizing that documents prepared by DOE contractors can qualify for protection under the deliberative process privilege, the Appellant urges that we not extend deliberative process protection when the originator of the information has a direct interest in the outcome of a policy being considered. Appeal at 3. We are not convinced that such a rule is necessary. If we find that release of any information would benefit the public interest we can always release that information under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. The public interest is better served if we maintain the flexibility to apply the privilege when necessary. Moreover, the cases cited in the Appeal in support of this contention are inapposite. (2) The cited cases hold that documents submitted by adverse outside parties in the course of settlement negotiations with an agency are not part of the agency's deliberative process. (3) However, those cases are clearly distinguishable from the present case, where the originators of the documents were not adversaries, but were paid by the agency to provide it with advice and consultation, and were therefore participating at its request in the agency's deliberative process. In contrast, parties engaged in settlement negotiations are not participating in the agency's deliberative process. Instead, they are adversaries. Therefore, we reject the Appellant's argument and find that each of the withheld documents are intra-agency documents.

ii. Whether the Withheld Materials are Predecisional

The Appeal next claims that the withheld documents are not predecisional since they were not "created antecedent to a specific agency decision to which [they] relate[]." Appeal at 5. However, it is well settled that the existence of the deliberative process privilege does not turn upon the ability of the agency to identify a specific decision in connection with which a memorandum is prepared. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 151 n. 18 (1975) (Sears). "Agencies are, and properly should be, engaged in a continuing process of examining their policies; this process will generate memoranda containing recommendations which do not ripen into agency decisions . . . ." Id. Since neither the Minutes nor the Report contain final agency decisions and since they are merely recommendations for further consideration, we find that they are properly classified as predecisional in nature.

iii. Whether the Withheld Materials are Deliberative

The Appeal asserts that substantial portions of the Minutes and the Report are not deliberative since they consist of "calculational results and technical conclusions." It is true that purely factual material is often not deliberative. See, e.g., Formaldehyde Institute v. Department of Health and Human Services, 889 F.2d 1118 (D.C. Cir. 1989).

However, the Appellant has misinterpreted the description of this material. In many instances, the calculational results and technical conclusions contained in the Minutes and Report are not factual in nature but rather are models and estimates and the opinions of technical experts. Much of the data contained in the Minutes and Report is unproven and unverified and is based upon experimental models, estimates and unproven assumptions. In this case, many of the computational results are far from fixed. Instead, they derive from a complex set of judgments, variables and assumptions. See Quarles v. Department of the Navy, 893 F.2d 390, 392-93 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (holding that cost estimates are not factual in nature). These portions of the withheld documents are therefore deliberative in nature.

The preceding analysis indicates that the Report and the Minutes are intra-agency documents that contain predecisional and deliberative material. However, the FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). The segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary when it is inextricably intertwined with the exempt material, such that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the confidentiality of the withheld material. Lead Industries Association v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979). Nor is segregation necessary when the selection of the factual materials itself would reveal the agency's deliberative process if released. See, e.g. Wolfe v. Department of Health and Human Services, 839 F.2d 768, 774-76 (D.C. Cir. 1988).

Our review of the documents at issue reveals that portions of the documents are purely factual and should have been released. Yet these documents were withheld in their entirety. Consequently, we shall remand this matter to the Operations Offices. On remand, Oakland and Oak Ridge must review the withheld documents and segregate and release all purely factual portions of the documents, or explain why they should be withheld under other applicable privileges or exemptions.

iv. Other Considerations

Even though we have found that portions of the Report and Minutes are eligible for withholding under Exemption 5, our inquiry is not finished. The fact that material requested falls within a statutory exemption does not necessarily preclude release of the material to the requester. The DOE regulations implementing the FOIA provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Yet, neither determination letter indicates that the Operation offices considered the public interest in disclosure. On remand, both Oak Ridge and Oakland should review the requested documents in order to determine whether their release would be in the public interest. If any of the requested information is still withheld on remand, new determination letters should explain why its release would not be in the public interest.

Moreover, it is the policy of the DOE with respect to Exemption 5 to withhold only information that, if released, would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that it protects. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (in order to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeable harm basic institutional interests that underlie the exemption claimed). Neither determination letter articulates any foreseeable harm to the basic interests that underlie Exemption 5. Accordingly, each office (Oakland and Oak Ridge) must, on remand, consider whether release of any information it intends to withhold would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by Exemption 5.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we are remanding this matter to Oakland and Oak Ridge. On remand, the Operations Offices should segregate and release all non-deliberative material to the Appellant. Furthermore, Oakland and Oak Ridge should consider whether release of the withheld information would be in the public interest or result in foreseeable harm to interests that are protected by Exemption 5. If it is determined that release of withheld information would be in the public interest or would not result in foreseeable harm to interests protected by Exemption 5, and that the withheld information should not be withheld under a different FOIA exemption, it should then be released to the Appellant. Any information that would not be in the public interest to release or would result in foreseeable harm that is protectable under any FOIA exemption may be withheld. (4)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by The Nuclear Control Institute on March 18, 1998 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Oakland and Oak Ridge Operations Offices for further proceedings consistent with the guidelines set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P.

Date of Filing:March 23, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0396

On March 23, 1998, Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P. (Appellant), filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on February 17, 1998, by the Rocky Flats Field Office (RFFO) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied a request for information that the Appellant submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In this Decision and Order, we will consider whether the DOE must conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA request.

I. Background

On December 2, 1997, the Appellant filed a request under the FOIA with DOE's Federal Energy Technology Center (FETC) in which it sought documents related to Request for Proposal (RFP) No. A66343. The request included documents related to the bidding process as well as documents related to the contract that the Appellant presumed was awarded under the RFP. On January 21, 1998, FETC issued a determination to the Appellant. FETC stated that the contract was being issued through RFFO and therefore the request was being forwarded to that office. On February 17, 1998, RFFO issued its determination, stating that it could not locate any responsive documents. On March 23, 1998, the Appellant filed the present Appeal in which it contends that RFFO's search for documents was inadequate and that RFFO should search the records of the Rocky Flats site's management and operating contractor, Kaiser-Hill Company (Kaiser-Hill), and release any responsive documents it locates.

II. Analysis

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

We contacted RFFO to determine how the search had been conducted. We learned that RFP No. A66343 was originally issued by a contractor, MSE, under the auspices of FETC, in order for MSE to hire a subcontractor to perform installation services at the Rocky Flats site. However, no contract was ever awarded because of internal DOE issues that arose between RFFO and FETC. Therefore, there are no documents concerning any awarded contract for RFP No. A66343. Moreover, RFFO possesses no responsive documents because it never performed oversight functions for the RFP at issue. The DOE entity overseeing this RFP was FETC, not RFFO. See Record of Telephone Conversation between John Drager, Office of Chief Counsel, RFFO, and Dawn L. Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA (March 31, 1998).

The Appellant also asserts that Kaiser-Hill possesses responsive documents. We learned that although Kaiser-Hill possessed no responsive documents as of the request date, it came into possession of some responsive documents afterwards. See Record of Telephone Conversation between John Drager and Dawn L. Goldstein (April 1, 1998). Under the FOIA, the search RFFO was required to conduct was only for documents possessed as of the date of the request. See Thomas P. Koenigs, 26 DOE ¶ 80,131 at 80,576-77 (1996). In light of the scope of RFFO's search and its explanation that it did not oversee the RFP at issue, we find that its search was adequate. However, if the Appellant wishes, it may file a new request with RFFO for documents Kaiser-Hill received after the date of the Appellant's request.(1)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P. on March 23, 1998, Case Number VFA-0396, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)*/ As the overseeing DOE entity for the RFP at issue, the Federal Energy Technology Center, possesses records which are responsive to the portions of the request concerning the bidding process. FETC has recently issued a second determination to the Appellant regarding only these records, which is not the subject of this Appeal. Case No. VFA-0397, 27 DOE ¶ 80,134

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Eva Glow Brownlow

Date of Filing: March 23, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0397

On March 23, 1998, Eva Glow Brownlow filed an Appeal from a determination issued to her on March 5, 1998, by the Albuquerque Operations Office (AL) of the Department of Energy. That determination concerned a request for information that Ms. Brownlow submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, AL would be ordered to release the requested information.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On December 5, 1997, Ms. Brownlow filed a FOIA request seeking copies of several documents related to a Reduction-in-Force (RIF) Exercise that AL conducted in September 1997. Ms. Brownlow specifically requested, inter alia, a copy of the RIF notice which would have been mailed to her as part of a RIF exercise and documents regarding her standing on a Retention Register prepared in anticipation of a RIF. See Determination Letter at 1. In its March 5, 1998 determination letter, AL identified one document responsive to Ms. Brownlow's request. (1) AL located a Retention Register that was applicable at the time of the RIF exercise. A Retention Register is a listing based on the records of current employees who are in the same competitive level, i.e. job title, series and grade, and is prepared in anticipation of a RIF. AL withheld this document in its entirety pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA. The Determination Letter further stated that because a RIF was never ordered by the DOE, the requested information is considered predecisional in nature and protected by Exemption 5. Id. at 1. The Determination Letter also concluded that the release of the document would not be in the public interest.

On March 23, 1998, Ms. Brownlow filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). In her Appeal, Ms. Brownlow asserts that AL has not explained how the release of the Retention Register would harm the government's decision-making processes. Additionally, Ms. Brownlow argues that DOE Headquarters has previously provided selected RIF exercise information to its employees, "some or all of which was certainly predecisional." See Appeal Letter at 2. Further, Ms. Brownlow asserts that AL has not demonstrated how the requested information would be "detrimental" to the public interest. Id. at 3. For these reasons, Ms. Brownlow requests that the OHA direct AL to release the requested information.

II. Analysis

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents which are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege, and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corporation v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). In withholding the RIF exercise information, AL relied upon the "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government decisions and policies are formulated. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. It is intended to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939 (Cl. Ct. 1958)) (Mink). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151.

In order to be shielded by Exemption 5, a document must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The document at issue is a Retention Register for those positions at AL that would possibly have been affected during a RIF exercise in September 1997. According to AL, on August 1, 1997, Deputy Secretary Elizabeth Moler advised all DOE offices "to take actions necessary to prepare for a RIF based on the House of Representatives appropriations mark-up to the DOE budget." Determination Letter at 1. The Office of Human Resources at AL prepared this Retention Register in anticipation of a RIF. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Veronica Monthan, Chief of Employment, AL and Kimberly Jenkins-Chapman, Staff Attorney, OHA (April 9, 1998). However, AL has stated that its Manager requested an extension of the deadline for the issuance of RIF notices in order to "rework" the Retention Register. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Veronica Monthan, Chief of Employment, AL and Kimberly Jenkins-Chapman, Staff Attorney, OHA (April 23, 1998). Further, AL has indicated that it was awaiting approval of its extension request when the Deputy Secretary advised it that a RIF would not take place. Id. Thus, AL maintains that the Retention Register was not in its final form, but rather a draft document which was pre-decisional in nature. Id.

Given the facts presented to us, we find that the requested document is a pre-decisional, deliberative intra-agency document. It was created by AL officials in anticipation of a RIF that never occurred, consists of recommendations which reflect the consultative process and never reached its final form. It is well settled that draft documents, by their very nature, are pre-decisional and deliberative. This category of documents has been afforded Exemption 5 protection because draft documents typically reflect "tentative views which might be altered or rejected upon further deliberation by the authors or by their superiors." Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866; Committee to Bridge the Gap, 20 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1990). Consequently, we have determined that Exemption 5 was properly applied to the document at issue. However, a very small amount of segregable factual material, consisting of column headings, has been released to Ms. Brownlow.

In addition, Ms. Brownlow has argued that because some offices at DOE Headquarters have provided RIF information to their employees, AL should provide the same type of information to her. We find this argument to be unpersuasive. The fact that a DOE office has exercised its discretion to release similar documents outside of the FOIA process is not determinative of whether a particular document may properly be withheld pursuant to the FOIA and is irrelevant to this Appeal. See Dennis Kirson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,225 (1997).

III. Public Interest Determination

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE shall release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that AL properly applied Exemption 5 to most of the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless requires disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. See Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (stating that the Department of Justice will defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption).

In the present case, the requested RIF exercise information consists of preliminary recommendations by AL Human Resource officials regarding which positions could be eliminated in the eventuality of a RIF. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of AL officials to make recommendations or voice opinions regarding a very sensitive issue potentially affecting the jobs of DOE employees. Employees and managers would be less likely to communicate their recommendations on this and similar issues if they knew or suspected that an agency would release their opinions to the public. Ms. Brownlow asserts that AL has not addressed how the release of the RIF information would not serve the public interest. However, AL officials have stated that, and we agree, the release of preliminary and therefore possibly inaccurate RIF exercise information could cause unnecessary confusion and distress among employees at AL. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard that the Attorney General articulated and that the release of the material contained in the requested information and protected pursuant to Exemption 5 would not be in the public interest. See Kirson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,225 at 80,869.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Eva Glow Brownlow on March 23, 1998, Case Number VFA-0397, is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0398, 27 DOE ¶ 80,133

April 28, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: McGraw-Hill Companies

Date of Filing: March 31, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0398

On March 31, 1998, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) received an Appeal filed by McGraw-Hill Companies (hereinafter referred to as "McGraw-Hill" or "the appellant") from a determination that the Office of Civilian Radioactive Waste Management (OCRWM) issued to it. The OCRWM issued this determination in response to a request for information that McGraw-Hill submitted in accordance with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the OCRWM to conduct a further search for responsive materials.

I. Background

In its FOIA request, McGraw-Hill sought access to any "correspondence and records of exchange between the [OCRWM], General Electric Co. and any other utilities or nuclear-related companies ... regarding the possible use of GE's Morris Operations facility ... for the interim storage of commercial utilities' spent fuel." FOIA Request at 1. In a letter to the appellant dated February 27, 1998, the OCRWM stated that it had searched its files and had found no documents responsive to McGraw-Hill's request.

In its appeal, McGraw-Hill claims that OCRWM has failed to conduct an adequate search. The appellant asserts that OCRWM personnel have met "on more than one occasion" with a representative of a waste transport company, and that there should be some record of those meetings. In addition, McGraw-Hill points out that if the DOE has contracted for any work on the subject of waste storage at the Morris facility, the contractor might possess responsive documents.(1)

II. Analysis

The FOIA requires that an agency "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (Truitt). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. The fact that the results of a search may not meet with the requester's expectations does not necessarily mean that the search was inadequate. Robert Hale, 25 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,501 (1995). Instead, in evaluating the adequacy of a search, our inquiry generally focuses on the scope of the search that was performed. See, e.g., Richard J. Levernier, 25 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1995).

We contacted OCRWM to ascertain the scope of the search for responsive documents that was performed. We were informed that the search included the Offices of Human Resources and Administration, Program Management and Integration and Waste Acceptance, Storage and Transportation. Furthermore, we were informed that OCRWM also searched for any memoranda or other documents referring to the correspondence and records of exchange requested by the appellant. See memorandums of April 24, 1998 telephone conversations between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and David Zabransky and Susan Showard, OCRWM. Based on the record in this case, we find that OCRWM's search was reasonably calculated to uncover sought materials and was therefore adequate.

We find the appellant's arguments to the contrary to be unpersuasive. As an initial matter, the fact that OCRWM personnel may have met with a representative of a waste transport company does not mean that records of those meetings exist or that any such records would be responsive to McGraw-Hill's request. Furthermore, we have been informed that the DOE has not entered into any contract for the use of the Morris facility for spent fuel storage. Id. Therefore, the record in this matter does not support the appellant's claim that responsive documents might be located in the files of a DOE contractor. For the reasons set forth above, we conclude that OCRWM's search for responsive documents was adequate, and that McGraw-Hill's appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the McGraw-Hill Companies on March 31, 1998 is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The appellant also implies that the OCRWM may have intentionally withheld responsive documents, stating that an unnamed representative of a "nuclear-related company" predicted to the appellant that no records would be found. Appeal at 1. In the absence of information concerning the identity of the representative, the circumstances surrounding the statement, and the representative's basis for making the statement, we attribute absolutely no weight to this implication.

April 17, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:FAS Engineering Incorporated

Date of Filings:March 23, 1998

Case Numbers:VFA-0400

VFA-0401

On March 23, 1998, FAS Engineering Incorporated (FAS) filed Appeals from two determinations that the Freedom of Information Act Official of the Idaho Operations Office (FOIA Official) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to it on February 12, 1998. In those determinations, the FOIA Official partially granted requests for information that FAS filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, which the DOE has implemented in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

I. Background

In its requests for information, FAS sought all information relating to DOE Solicitations DE-PS07-97ID13520 and DE-PS07-95ID13349. In his determinations, the FOIA Official, pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA, withheld in their entirety the “individual detailed application evaluations” for each bid solicitation. The FOIA Official also released seven other documents, but redacted information from six of them pursuant to Exemption 5 of the FOIA. In its Appeal, FAS requests that the DOE release all of the withheld and redacted information on the following grounds:

1. The law mandates prompt release of information normally available through civil discovery or litigation.
2. The DOE should release all of the names, resumes, and affiliations of all evaluators and decision makers.
3. The DOE should provide the complete text of evaluations and decisions.

II. Analysis

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted).

The courts have identified several privileges that fall under this definition. These privileges include the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

The FOIA Official withheld in their entirety the “individual detailed application evaluations” for the two bid solicitations. We reviewed these evaluations and find that they contain some information that is both predecisional and deliberative pursuant to Exemption 5. However, these documents also contain segregable factual information, including “rating guidelines” and headings, that the DOE may not withhold pursuant to Exemption 5. Furthermore, many of the redacted documents also contain additional segregable factual information, such as headings and the names of DOE contractor employees. Unless the names of contractor employees are “inextricably intertwined” with exempt material, the DOE may not withhold these names pursuant to Exemption 5. The DOE has not sufficiently explained how these contractor names meet the requirements of the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5. Finally, the DOE released portions of FAS’s bid proposals to FAS, but withheld from FAS other companies’ bid proposal information. Exemption 5 does not permit the DOE to withhold the proposal information it received from bidders since the information does not fall into the category of “inter-agency or intra-agency” documents. For these reasons, we will direct the FOIA Official to review all of these documents again and either release factual information, such as “rating guidelines,” headings, names of contractor employees and bid proposal submissions contained in these documents, or provide a detailed explanation for withholding any such information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeals FAS Engineering Incorporated filed on March 23, 1998, Case Nos. VFA-0400 and VFA-0401, are hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and are denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Act Official of the Idaho Operations Office of the Department of Energy for further action in accordance with the directions set forth in this Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

May 18, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Kramer, Rayson, Leake, Rodgers & Morgan

Date of Filing: April 20, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0402

On April 20, 1998, Kramer, Rayson, Leake, Rodgers & Morgan (Kramer) filed an appeal of a determination that the Department of Energy's (DOE's) Office of Inspector General (OIG) issued to the law firm on November 25, 1997.(1) That determination denied a request for information that Kramer filed on August 22, 1997, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require that OIG release responsive documents, if they exist, that were withheld under FOIA Exemption 7(C), 5 U.S.C. § 552 (b)(7)(C).

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

Kramer, a law firm, represents Lockheed Martin Energy Systems (LMES), the management and operating (M&O) contractor of DOE's Oak Ridge facility. On August 22, 1997, Kramer requested that DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office release a copy of an investigative file regarding a named individual. Letter from Kramer to Jane Payne, FOIA Officer, OIG (August 22, 1997). The OIG responded that it could neither confirm nor deny the existence of records responsive to Kramer's request, and denied the request under FOIA Exemption 7(C). 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C). Letter from Herbert Richardson, OIG, to Kramer (November 25, 1997). An agency's statement in response to a FOIA request that it will neither confirm nor deny the existence of records is commonly called a "Glomar" response.(2)

Kramer subsequently appealed OIG's determination. Letter from Kramer to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (April 6, 1998) (Appeal). According to Kramer, the individual, formerly employed by LMES' predecessor Martin Marietta Energy Systems, had charged LMES with malfeasance in the performance of its duties as M&O contractor. Kramer also argued that the individual had waived his privacy rights by litigating the claim. Id. If this Appeal were granted, OIG would be required to release the requested information, if it exists.

II. Analysis

This Decision and Order will focus on the propriety of OIG's determination of a privacy interest and OIG's use of the Glomar response in refusal to confirm or deny the existence of investigatory records concerning a third person. As detailed below, we will uphold both actions.

A. Exemption 7(C)

Exemption 7(C) of FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C), allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether the agency compiled such information as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974). Amendments to the FOIA in 1986 extended the protection of Exemption 7 to all records compiled for "law enforcement purposes." See Attorney General's Memorandum on the 1986 Amendments to the Freedom of Information Act (Dec. 1987).

OIG is a law enforcement body charged with investigating and correcting waste, fraud or abuse in programs administered or financed by the DOE. See Inspector General Act of 1978, codified as amended at 5 U.S.C. app. §§ 2(1)-(2), 4(a)(1), (3)-(4), (d), 6(a)(1)-(4), 7(a), 9(a)(1)(E). As a result of its duties, we find that OIG compiles reports involving official misconduct for "law enforcement purposes" within the meaning of Exemption 7(C). See Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1995).

B. The Balancing Test Under Exemption 7(C)

In determining whether the disclosure of law enforcement records could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, courts have used a balancing test, weighing the privacy interests that would be infringed against the public interest in disclosure. Department of Justice v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762 (1989) (Reporters Committee); Safecard Services, Inc. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard); Lesar v. Department of Justice, 636 F.2d 472, 486 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

1. The privacy interest

An individual who files an official complaint alleging irregularities in DOE's operations has a privacy interest in being protected from possible retaliation. We have previously found that sources mentioned in OIG files have a strong privacy interest in remaining anonymous. See Blumberg, Seng, Ikeda & Albers, 25 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,563 (1995); James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1991). Indeed, the courts have recognized the possibility of harassment or intimidation of these sources, and have consistently found that privacy interests in the identities of individuals providing information to government investigators are greatly amplified. Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991), cited in Stoel Rives, LLP, 25 DOE ¶ 80,189 at 80,724 (1996). Therefore, unless that person has waived this privacy interest, he is entitled to protection from disclosure of his activities.

We find a cognizable privacy interest at stake in this case. Kramer argues that the named individual has "waived any possible claim of personal privacy" by: (1) offering into evidence in a federal court case a memorandum that accuses LMES of malfeasance in the performance of its functions as M&O contractor at Oak Ridge; and (2) by testifying in a deposition about conversations with representatives of OIG. Appeal at 2. Kramer attached to its Appeal an unsigned document purported to be a copy of the memorandum allegedly offered in evidence in the court case. However, we find that the unsigned document does not provide official confirmation that an OIG enforcement file or proceeding exists. Similarly, we do not accept as confirmation of an official proceeding Kramer's vague allegations that the named individual testified in a deposition. We have previously stated that we cannot accept unsubstantiated allegations of official confirmation that an enforcement file or proceeding exists. See Keci, 26 DOE at 80,662. Therefore, we find that the individual retains a personal privacy interest in the requested material.

2. The public interest in disclosure

Having established the existence of a privacy interest, the next step is to determine whether there is a public interest in disclosure. We have held that the public interest in disclosure is measured not by the degree of the requester's interest in disclosure, but rather by "the right of the public to obtain the same information." The Die-Gem Co., Inc., 19 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,569 (1989) (quoting Nix v. United States, 572 F.2d 998, 1003 (4th Cir. 1978)). The Supreme Court has held that information which does not directly reveal government operations or activities "falls outside the ambit of the public interest that the FOIA was enacted to serve." Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 775.

Kramer claims that "there is an overriding public interest in the disclosure of the requested information." Appeal at 2. However, Kramer has neither explained what that public interest may be, nor provided any proof that the allegations were part of an official proceeding. Courts have held that unsubstantiated allegations of official misconduct do not establish a public interest in disclosure. See McCutchen v. HHS, 30 F.3d 183 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (allegations that agency is not doing its job do not create a public interest sufficient to override privacy interest protected by Exemption 7(C)); Triestman v. Department of Justice, 878 F. Supp. 667 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (no substantial public interest in disclosure of information concerning possible investigation of law enforcement agent). Therefore, we find that the public interest in disclosure of unsubstantiated allegations of official misconduct is negligible, and is outweighed by the individual's real and identifiable privacy interest.

C. Disclosure of the Existence of Records Would Reveal Exempt Information

In reviewing this Appeal, we contacted employees of OIG to discuss the Glomar response to Kramer's FOIA request. According to OIG, that office originally believed that Kramer represented the named individual. However, when the OIG discovered that Kramer represented LMES, the OIG then followed its policy of refusing to confirm or deny the existence of records in response to a FOIA request when six factors exist.(3) See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Jackie Becker, Attorney, OIG and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (April 23, 1998). In this case, OIG determined that the six factors existed and on that basis issued a Glomar response to Kramer's FOIA request. In order to use a Glomar response with Exemption 7, there must be a cognizable privacy interest at stake and insufficient public interest in disclosure to outweigh that privacy interest. See William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996). A Glomar response is justified when the records sought, if they exist, would be exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(C) of the FOIA, and the confirmation of the existence of such records would itself reveal exempt information. See Antonelli v. FBI, 721 F.2d 615 (7th Cir. 1983); William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996).

We find that OIG's Glomar response to Kramer was justified. If OIG enforcement records involving the named individual exist, refusal to confirm or deny the existence of these records is proper under Exemption 7(C).(4) A Glomar response to such FOIA requests is necessary to protect the privacy rights of individuals whose identity may be revealed in an OIG investigation. By refusing to confirm or deny the existence of an enforcement file that mentions the named individual, OIG has properly protected that individual's privacy rights. Thus, we find that OIG was justified in providing a Glomar response to this request because the confirmation of the existence of such records would itself reveal exempt information. Accordingly, we will deny this Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Kramer, Rayson, Leake, Rodgers & Morgan on April 20, 1998, OHA Case No. VFA-0402, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)Kramer requested that its appeal be accepted notwithstanding the fact that it was submitted outside of the time specified in the regulations for the submission of appeals. In the interest of administrative efficiency, OHA granted the request.

(2)“Glomar” refers to the first instance in which a federal court upheld the adequacy of such a response. Phillippi v. CIA, 546 F.2d 1009 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (agency responded to a request for documents pertaining to a submarine-retrieval ship named the Hughes Glomar Explorer by neither confirming nor denying the existence of any such documents).

(3)When the following factors exist, OIG will issue a Glomar response: (1) the request is made by a third party; (2) the request is for information about a person identified by name; (3) the requested records, if they exist, would be contained in an enforcement file; (4) the named individual is not deceased; (5) the individual has not given the requester a waiver of his privacy right; and (6) there has been no official confirmation that an enforcement file or proceeding exists. See Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,150 at 80,660 (1996) (Keci) (quoting memorandum from Jackie Becker, OIG, to Linda Lazarus, OHA (November 27, 1996)).

(4)It is important to note that we could reach the same result by relying on those cases that hold that the names of private individuals appearing in an agency’s law enforcement files are “categorically” exempt from disclosure under Exemption 7(C). Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1205- 06.

Case No. VFA-0403, 27 DOE ¶ 80136

May 4, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Air-Con, Inc.

Date of Filing: April 7, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0403

On April 7, 1998, Air-Con, Inc., the Appellant, filed an Appeal from a final determination that the Idaho Operations Office (IO) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued on March 17, 1998. In its determination, IO informed the Appellant that it could not locate documents responsive to a request for information that the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

BACKGROUND

Because this Appeal involves a FOIA request for documents regarding a contract dispute between contractors at the Idaho National Engineering and Environmental Laboratory (INEEL), a DOE facility, a brief description of the entities involved in the dispute is given below. DOE contracted with Lockheed Martin Idaho Technologies Companies (LMITCO) to be the management and operations contractor for the INEEL facility. LMITCO subsequently contracted with Lockheed Martin Advanced Environmental Systems (LMAES) to construct remediation facilities and to environmentally remediate the Pit 9 area at INEEL. LMAES subsequently contracted with Kiewit Construction Co. (Kiewit) for construction of remediation facilities for Pit 9. Appellant then became a sub-contractor for Kiewit for the Pit 9 remediation facilities. Subsequently, LMAES terminated the contract with Kiewit for the Pit 9 remediation facilities. Kiewit then terminated its contract with the Appellant. After negotiations, Kiewit entered into a global settlement with LMAES for its claims regarding the termination of the contract as well as the claims of all of Kiewit's subcontractors, including the Appellant.

In a letter dated February 18, 1998 (Request), the Appellant submitted a FOIA Request to IO for all documents containing information regarding the contract termination settlement between LMAES and Kiewit. IO informed the Appellant in its March 17, 1998 determination letter (Determination Letter) that neither it nor LMITCO possessed documents responsive to the Request. Enclosed with the Determination letter was a copy of a letter from LMITCO to LMAES informing LMAES that LMITCO would not attend meetings regarding the termination costs of various LMAES subcontractors and suppliers. In its Appeal, the Appellant challenges the adequacy of IO's search for responsive documents.

ANALYSIS

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Consequently, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. NSA, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

We contacted the FOIA Officer at IO to inquire as to the nature of its search for responsive documents. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Carl Robertson, FOIA Officer, IO and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (April 13, 1998). He informed us that IO contacted various IO contracting officials and none had any knowledge regarding the existence of responsive documents. He then contacted LMITCO which subsequently conducted a search of its offices. LMITCO informed the FOIA Officer that it had no responsive documents and that LMAES alone conducted the settlement negotiations with Kiewit. While the FOIA Officer believes that LMAES likely possesses responsive documents, he also believes that any documents LMAES possesses are not agency records subject to the FOIA.

In reviewing the adequacy of IO's search, we must now consider whether responsive documents which might be possessed by LMAES are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. (1) In addition, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that any responsive documents that LMAES possesses are not "agency records" and that they are also not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis the courts have fashioned for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as LMAES, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., Los Alamos Study Group, 26 DOE ¶ 80,212 (1997) (LASG). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See LASG, 26 DOE at 80,841.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). In making the determination whether an entity is an agency for purposes of the FOIA, the Supreme Court has held that an entity will not be considered a federal agency for purposes of the FOIA unless its operations are subject to "extensive, detailed, and virtually day-to-day supervision." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 & n. 11 (1980) (citing United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976)). In the present case, the DOE has no contractual relationship with LMAES. Further, the DOE does not supervise LMAES's day-to-day operations. We therefore conclude that LMAES is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although LMAES is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, its records relevant to the Appellant's request could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time the Appellant made its FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989). In this case, none of the potentially responsive documents was in the DOE's control or possession at the time of the Appellant's request. Based on these facts, the documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). However, in the present case, the DOE does not have a contractual relationship with LMAES. Consequently, this regulatory provision would not apply to any responsive documents LMAES might possess.

Given the facts described above, we believe that IO's search was reasonably calculated to discover responsive documents. IO searched its offices and LMITCO's offices and did not locate responsive documents. While LMAES might possess responsive documents, such documents are not subject to the FOIA or to the DOE policy on contractor records described in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). Because we find that IO's search was adequate, the Appellant's submission will be denied.

May 8, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Applicant:Francis M. Kovac

Case Number: VFA-0404

Date of Filing: April 9, 1998

On April 9, 1998, Francis Kovac of Oak Ridge, Tennessee, filed an Appeal from a determination issued on March 5, 1998, by the Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge Operations) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied Mr. Kovac's request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the federal government, and which have not been made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). This Appeal, if granted, would require Oak Ridge Operations to conduct another search of its files for responsive information.

BACKGROUND

Mr. Kovac is a Councilman for the City of Oak Ridge, Tennessee. On February 12, 1998, Councilman Kovac submitted a handwritten note to Oak Ridge Operations requesting “a copy of any data showing the U.S. Department of Energy paid money directly or reimbursed” seven specified individuals. On March 5, 1998, Oak Ridge Operations responded that a search of the files in its control and possession revealed only one responsive document. However, no documents accompanied the determination letter, and in fact that letter set forth the procedures for appealing a determination in which the DOE stated that no responsive documents existed. Oak Ridge Operations claims that the language in the letter was a mistake. It reaffirmed to both Councilman Kovac and this Office that there were no responsive documents.

Councilman Kovac challenges the adequacy of the Oak Ridge Operations search. In support of his claim that the search was insufficient, Councilman Kovac submitted photocopies of requests for payment or reimbursement that a DOE contractor made to Oak Ridge Operations. Some of the names that Councilman Kovac listed in his present FOIA request appear on those documents either as potential recipients of reimbursements or as signatories of the claim(s) for reimbursement on behalf of the DOE contractor.

Under the FOIA, in response to an appropriate request that reasonably describes the information sought and conforms to agency regulations, an agency must search its records and release responsive, unpublished, non-exempt information that it has created or obtained. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3), (b); Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 144-45 (1989); James L. Schwab, 22 DOE ¶ 80,127 at 80,558 (1992). A search that complies with the FOIA need not cover every corner of the agency. Oglesby

v. Department of the Army, 920 F.2d 57, 68 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (and cases cited therein); Citizens' Action Committee of Pike County Citizens, 22 DOE ¶ 80,178 at 80,679 (1993). Rather, an adequate search under the FOIA need only be one reasonably calculated to uncover the documents requested. Kowalczyk v. Department of Justice, 73 F.3d 386, 389 (D.C. Cir. 1996); Thomas Stampahar, 26 DOE ¶ 80,140 at 80,593-94 (1996). "An adequate search, however, must be 'a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents.'" Energy Research Foundation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529 (1992) (quoting The Lowry Coalition, 21 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,535 (1991)).

We contacted Oak Ridge Operations to determine if it performed a proper search. Oak Ridge Operations informed us that it referred this search to its Finance Division, which is responsible for all disbursements. The Finance Division stated that it searched the Departmental Integrated Accounting System (DIAS) database. Among its functions, DIAS is the combined accounting and record keeping system that Oak Ridge Operations uses to make and track disbursements. A check of the DIAS accounts payable records for the seven names Councilman Kovac listed found no matches. Thus, it appears DOE made no direct payments to the seven persons who were the subject of this request.

Although the DIAS System only shows disbursements made by DOE, at our request, Oak Ridge Operations searched to determine whether there might be records from DOE contractors showing disbursements to its employees, consultants, or subcontractors. Oak Ridge Operations stated that it does have forms from at least some contractors that deal with either requests for reimbursement or financial status, and that these forms may list some names of individuals who were part of the contractor’s claim for reimbursement. These seem to be the forms that Councilman Kovac submitted on appeal but which were not available to Oak Ridge Operations during its original search. Oak Ridge Operations informed us that if Councilman Kovac submits a new FOIA request matching the names of individuals to the DOE contractor(s) he believes may have submitted requests for reimbursement, it will attempt to search its records for any potentially responsive documents.

We believe that given the state of the information before it at the time of its search, Oak Ridge Operations made a satisfactory attempt to satisfy Councilman Kovac’s request. Therefore, we find that the Oak Ridge Operations search was conscientiously performed, was reasonably calculated to reveal the records Councilman Kovac sought, and satisfies the requirements of the FOIA. Cf. Archie M. LeGrand, Jr., 25 DOE ¶ 80,171 at 80,681 (1996). Accordingly, Mr. Kovac's Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Francis M. Kovac of Oak Ridge, Tennessee, OHA Case No. VFA-0404, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Diane C. Larson

Date of Filing: April 14, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0405

This decision concerns an Appeal filed on April 14, 1998 by Diane C. Larson (Appellant). The Appellant submitted a request for information to the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (IG) seeking copies of an IG case file (Case File No. I96RS154) under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Determination Letter at 1. On March 16, 1998, the IG issued a determination in response to this request, redacting the names of individuals and other identifying information from five of the six documents it provided to the Appellant. On April 14, 1998, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that the IG's withholding of the information was improper.

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemptions 6 and 7(C) are at issue in the present case.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding based on either civil and criminal statutes. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982); Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Williams v. IRS, 479 F.2d 317, 318 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom. Donolon v. IRS, 414 U.S. 1024 (1973). By law, the IG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. The IG is therefore a classic example of an organization with a law enforcement mandate. In the present case the IG's investigatory actions were clearly within this statutory mandate.

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, if privacy interests exist, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 109 S. Ct. 1468, 1481 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

The IG has found a privacy interest in the identities of the individuals whose names have been withheld. The Determination letter states in pertinent part:

Names and information that would tend to disclose the identity of certain individuals have been withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Individuals involved in Office of Inspector General investigations, which in this case includes reprisal complainants, are entitled to privacy protections so that they will be free from harassment, intimidation and other personal intrusions.

Determination Letter at 1. Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals whose names are contained in investigative files. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985). Accordingly, we have followed the courts' lead. James L. Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE ¶ 80,129 (1990).

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. The Court found that only information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990). We fail to see how release of the identities of individuals in the present case would inform the public about the operations and activities of Government. Accordingly, we find that there is little or no public interest in disclosure of the individuals' identities.

After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing an individual's identity would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Accordingly, we once again find that the identities of the individuals were properly withheld under Exemptions 6 and 7(C). See, e.g., Tod Rockefeller, 26 DOE ¶ 80,238 (1997).

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about DOE actions, we are also mindful of the need to preserve the privacy rights of individuals. By releasing the responsive document with only those redactions necessary to prevent identification of specific individuals, which is what has been done here, the agency can provide as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Diane C. Larson on April 14, 1998 (Case Number VFA-0405) is hereby denied.

requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Applicant: James E. Minter

Case Number: VFA-0406

Date of Filing: April 17, 1998

On April 17, 1998, James Minter of Knoxville, Tennessee, filed an Appeal from a determination issued on March 12, 1998, by the Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque Operations) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied Mr. Minter's request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.(1)

The FOIA requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the Federal Government, and which have not been made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). In addition to this requirement, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure will nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

BACKGROUND

On December 13, 1997, Mr. Minter filed a FOIA request with Albuquerque Operations, Transportation Safeguard Division. In considering the request, Albuquerque Operations determined that Mr. Minter wanted to know whether the DOE paid a particular DOE employee overtime for physical fitness activity while on specified days of official travel. Physical fitness is apparently a requirement for some DOE jobs. Albuquerque Operations identified two documents as responsive to Mr. Minter's request. One was the employee's time card showing the hours worked for the relevant period. The other was his trip report of activities for the requested time period. On March 12, 1998, Albuquerque Operations issued a determination letter in which it asserted that any responsive documents were shielded in their entirety by Exemption 6 of the FOIA, which protects personal privacy. Mr. Minter appeals this decision claiming that no harm to an important interest will result from disclosure of the requested information, and that the agency failed to segregate and release non-exempt material.

Exemption 6 permits an agency to make a discretionary withholding of information that must otherwise be released in response to a FOIA request if the materials are "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. §

552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). After ensuring that the documents meet the threshold test for types of material covered by Exemption 6, an agency must balance the public interest in disclosure with the privacy interest involved. Department of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 164, 175 (1991); Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. For Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762 (1989); Harold H. Johnson, 21 DOE ¶ 80,148 at 80,640 (1991).

First, we find that the documents Albuquerque Operations correctly identified as responsive to this request, trip reports of activities and time cards for hours worked, clearly fall within Exemption 6's threshold requirement that the records be "personnel and medical and similar files." Under the Supreme Court's expansive view of this phrase, Exemption 6 extends to "detailed Government records on an individual which can be identified as applying to that individual." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 602 (1982) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 89-1497, at 11 (1966), reprinted in 1966 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2418, 2428). Both the trip reports and the time cards identifiably relate to the particular person on whom Mr. Minter seeks information.

After determining that Exemption 6 applies to this type of information, we advance to the second part of the Exemption 6 test. This second part has three prongs. For each type of information withheld, we must identify the relevant privacy interest for the concerned individual, and the relevant public interest in release, and then balance these two competing interests.

One of the basic principles underlying the FOIA is that, "[t]he public has a significant, enduring interest in remaining informed about actions taken by public officials in the cause of their duties." New England Apple Council v. Donovan, 725 F.2d 139, 144 (1st Cir. 1984). For this reason,

[a]s a general matter, there simply is no privacy interest in material stating or describing a federal employee's official actions or duties ?unless the work somehow reveals something personal or private about the individual . . . or there is some other special circumstance (for example, a reasonable, articulable belief that the person could be subject to harassment. . .).'

Mary Feild Jarvis, 26 DOE ¶ 80,190 at 80,787 (1997) (quoting The Cincinnati Enquirer, 25 DOE ¶ 80,206 at 70,769 (1996) (citations omitted)). See also William H. Payne, 25 DOE ¶ 80,190 at 80,727 (1996). This rule applies to work performed both at and away from the federal employee's regular duty station. Thus, at the least, as long as the activity is part of his or her official functions and is performed while on official duty time, a federal employee cannot claim a zone of privacy even if the activity takes place away from a government site or on "overtime." In this case, the trip report, including the description of overtime work, falls into this general rule.

The same general standard outlined above for official duties of federal employees also applies to the aggregate amount of time spent working as a government employee. We have held that there is no privacy interest in the amount (as opposed to the type) of leave-time federal employees use. Marlene Flor, 26 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,511 (1996). See also Dobronski v. Federal Communications Comm'n, 17 F.3d 275, 279 (9th Cir. 1994) (records of dates and times of federal employee sick leave non-exempt because of small privacy interest and large public interest in that case); Jafari v. Department of the Navy, 728 F.2d 247, 249 (4th Cir. 1984) (records of reservist attendance at military duties to employer are unrelated to "official nature of those absences; []or to any reason that may have been assigned to [those absences]," and thus their release is not a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy). If there is no privacy interest in the aggregate amount of leave-time used by federal employees, it follows that there usually is no privacy interest in the aggregate amount of time spent performing official functions. Rather, this is simply another facet of the general rule that federal employees ordinarily lack a privacy interest in their official duties. Thus, when the agency seeks to withhold on privacy grounds the aggregate amount of time spent on official duties by its employees, it can do so only when the release of the material would reveal something personal or private about a person or would implicate other special circumstances. See also Greenpeace U.S.A., Inc. v. Environmental Protection Agency, 735 F. Supp. 13, 14 (D.D.C. 1990) (record showing official attendance of EPA employee at public meeting not withholdable under FOIA Exemption 6);

American Fed'n of Gov't Employees v. National Aeronautics and Space Admin., 482 F. Supp. 281, 282-83 (S.D. Tex. 1980) (daily sign-in sheet is not protected by Privacy Act because it is not "in and of itself, reflective of some quality or characteristic of an individual").

In this case, Albuquerque Operations did not explain the privacy interest it identified and how it fits into the standard articulated above for either of the responsive documents it withheld. Accordingly, we will remand this case to Albuquerque Operations to either release the withheld material or issue a new determination. In the event it continues to withhold the information, Albuquerque Operations must either explain the application of a different exemption or explain the privacy interest in this material as outlined in this Decision. Even if it does find some privacy interest, before it may withhold the information Albuquerque Operations must identify any public interest in release and determine that on balance the privacy interest outweighs the public interest. In addition, if Albuquerque Operations withholds any material, it must segregate and release any non-exempt information.(2)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by James Minter of Knoxville, Tennessee, OHA Case No. VFA-0406, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Albuquerque Operations Office to issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the alleged agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)Mr. Minter also cited the Privacy Act as a basis for both his original request for information and for this Appeal. The Privacy Act, insofar as it is relevant to this case, only applies to "access to record[s] or to any information pertaining to [the requester] which is contained in the system [of records]." 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). In his request, Mr. Minter seeks information about a person other than himself. Consequently, Albuquerque Operations correctly determined that only the FOIA applied to his request.

(2)In this case, it is possible there may be additional responsive documents such as payroll records that show the payment of overtime. If these records exist, Albuquerque Operations should identify and analyze them in the same manner as described for the other identified documents discussed in this decision.

Case No. VFA-0411, 27 DOE ¶ 80,143

June 4, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:David E. Ridenour

Date of Filing: May 6, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0411

On May 6, 1998, David E. Ridenour completed the filing of an Appeal from a final determination that the Office of Inspector General (OIG) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued on March 31, 1998. (1) In its determination, OIG withheld portions of six documents and did not provide copies of 18 other documents that were responsive to a request for information that Mr. Ridenour filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

I. BACKGROUND

In a request for information, dated November 28, 1997 (Request), Mr. Ridenour sought documents pertaining to his April 1997 complaint to OIG regarding DOE management misconduct. (2) In a March 31, 1998 determination letter (Determination Letter), OIG provided Mr. Ridenour with a list of 33 documents responsive to his request.(3) The Determination Letter stated that three documents (Document Nos. 4, 5 and 6) originated with other DOE offices and that these offices would provide Mr. Ridenour with a determination regarding those documents. The Determination Letter enclosed copies of six documents (Document Nos. 7, 8, 27, 29, 30 and 31) in their entirety. Redacted copies of six other documents (Document Nos. 1, 2, 3, 22, 24 and 28) were also provided to Mr. Ridenour. The Determination Letter stated that information in Document Nos. 1, 2, 3, 22 and 24 was being withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C). The information withheld in these documents consisted of names and other information which could disclose the identity of certain individuals. The Determination Letter stated that the individuals mentioned in the documents were entitled to "privacy protections so that they will be free from harassment, intimidation and other personal intrusions" and that it would not be in the public interest to release the withheld material. Determination Letter at 1. Portions of Document No. 28 were withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. The Determination Letter stated Exemption 5's purpose was to protect the deliberative and consultative process of government and that the material withheld in that document consisted of an OIG agent's note containing "predecisional deliberative data which would have been subject to change." Id. With regard to the remaining identified 18 responsive documents, the Determination Letter stated that they would not be provided to Mr. Ridenour since those documents "were either written by you [Mr. Ridenour] or were provided by you and would already be in your possession." Id. at 2.

In his submission, Mr. Ridenour asserts several grounds for his Appeal. First, he claims that he should have been provided a determination regarding the three documents which were referred to other DOE offices. In this regard, Mr. Ridenour states that the time period for OIG's response pursuant to the FOIA has elapsed. In addition, Mr. Ridenour argues that OIG was inconsistent in its release of material. Specifically, he states that while he was given redacted copies of two responsive documents which he authored in whole or in part (Document Nos. 22 and 24), he was not provided copies of 18 other responsive documents of which he was the author (Document Nos. 9-21, 23, 25, 26, 32 and 33). Mr. Ridenour also argues that other unidentified documents must exist since he was not provided a copy of several reports mentioned in Document No. 28. Mr. Ridenour also challenges the propriety of OIG's withholding of information from Document Nos. 1-3, 22, 24 and 28. Specifically, with regard to Document Nos. 22 and 24, Mr. Ridenour asserts that the withholding was inappropriate since he was the author of Document No. 22 and of an attachment to Document No. 24.

II. ANALYSIS

A. Adequacy of the Search

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

OIG informed us that when it received Mr. Ridenour's Request, it conducted a computer search of its files. Based upon this search, OIG identified two files which were most likely to contain responsive documents. One of the files was the investigation file pertaining to the complaint mentioned in the request. The other file was an investigation file pertaining to another complaint Mr. Ridenour filed later in 1997. OIG identified all responsive documents in each of the files in its Determination Letter. OIG informed us that all documents responsive to Mr. Ridenour's request would be located in these files and that it had no knowledge of any responsive documents that would exist in any other files. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Pamela Langer, Counsel, OIG, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (May 18, 1998). Given the facts described above, we believe that OIG's search was reasonably calculated to discover responsive documents.

Mr. Ridenour's argument regarding the existence of other documents is unavailing. While Document No. 28 does reference other documents, OIG has informed us that some reports are not customarily retained in a closed investigative file if relevant portions were incorporated in other documents in the file. Consequently, all documents used in an investigation are not necessarily retained in their entirety in an OIG investigative file. See Memorandum from Pamela Langer, Attorney, OIG, to Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (May 13, 1998). In light of this information, we can not conclude that additional documents exist at OIG by virtue of the fact that they were mentioned in Document No. 28. Consequently, we find OIG's search to be adequate.

B. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted).

The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, the document must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1078 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

OIG withheld portions of Document No. 28 pursuant to Exemption 5. The document, entitled "Agent's Notes," contains a list by date of an OIG agent's activities regarding Mr. Ridenour's complaint. The withheld information in the document appears to contain mostly factual, non- deliberative information. Exemption 5 does not protect the type of information withheld in Document No. 28. Consequently, we will remand this matter to OIG so that it may either release the withheld information or issue another determination explaining why the information may be withheld pursuant to the FOIA. (4)

C. Exemptions 6 and 7(C)

In five documents provided to Mr. Ridenour (Document Nos. 1-3, 22 and 24), OIG withheld the names, titles and other identifying information of individuals mentioned in these documents. Each of these documents was contained in the OIG investigatory file regarding Mr. Ridenour's April 1997 complaint.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982). Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii).

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. See Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 489 U.S 749 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3 (Exemption 6); Stone v. FBI, 727 F.Supp 662, 663-64 (D.D.C. 1990) (Exemption 7(C)).

We have previously considered cases in which both Exemption 6 and 7(C) were invoked, and we stated that in such cases, provided the Exemption 7 threshold requiring a valid law enforcement purpose is met, we would analyze the withholding only under Exemption 7(C), the broader of the two exemptions. See, e.g., K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1992). Since, as discussed below, all of the documents involved here were compiled for law enforcement purposes, any document that satisfies Exemption 7(C)'s "reasonableness" standard will be protected. Conversely, documents not protected by Exemption 7(C) will be unable to satisfy Exemption 6's more restrictive requirement that they constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974). By law, OIG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. OIG is therefore a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate. Ortiz v. Department of Health and Human Services, 70 F.3d 729, 732-33 (2d Cir. 1995) (Ortiz) and cases cited therein. In the present case, OIG's actions in investigating Mr. Ridenour's complaint regarding alleged misconduct of a DOE management official were clearly within this statutory mandate and the documents at issue were created for a law enforcement purpose.

(1) Privacy Interest

Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals mentioned in law enforcement files, whether they be suspects, witnesses or investigators. See, e.g., Fitzgibbon v. CIA, 911 F.2d 755, 767 (D.C. Cir. 1990); Computer Professionals for Social Responsibility v. United States Secret Service, 72 F.3d 897, 904 (D.C. Cir 1996) (Computer Professionals). Accordingly, we find that the individuals whose identities were withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

(2) Public Interest in Disclosure

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's basic purpose. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 772. The Court identified the basic purpose of the FOIA as "'to open agency action to the light of public scrutiny.'" Id. (quoting Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S 352, 372 (1976)). Therefore, the Court held that official information that sheds light on an agency's performance of its statutory duties falls squarely within that statutory purpose. Id. at 773. The Court further found that information about private citizens that is contained in government files but reveals little or nothing about an agency's own conduct does not further the basic purpose of the FOIA. Id. We note that, in Mr. Ridenour's initial request to OIG, he cited a public interest (for the purposes of a request for a waiver of fees) in enabling the public to understand how their government works regarding the oversight of management integrity and ethics. Letter from David E. Ridenour to GayLa Sessoms, Director, FOIA/Privacy Act Division (November 28, 1997). Assuming arguendo that this is the public interest to be served by release of the withheld names, such interest would be insubstantial. Names appearing in law enforcement files are generally not themselves very probative of an agency's behavior or performance. See SafeCard Services v. SEC, 926 F.2d 1197 at 1205 (D.C. Cir 1991). Such information would only serve a significant public interest if there is compelling evidence that an agency is engaged in illegal activity. Id. After examining the documents in question, it is not apparent that release of the individuals' names and identifying information would contribute to the public's understanding of the DOE's behavior or performance in carrying out its duties. Nor is there compelling evidence before us of illegal activity. Thus, in the present case, we conclude there is little or no public interest in the disclosure of the names and identifying information withheld in the documents at issue in the present case.

(3) The Balancing Test

Because release of the individuals' names or other identifying information could reasonably be expected to subject them to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against little or no public interest, we find that release of information revealing the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Consequently, we find that the OIG properly withheld the information redacted in Document Nos. 1-3, 22 and 24 under Exemptions 6 and 7(C).

Our conclusion with regard to Document Nos. 22 and 24 is not changed by virtue of the fact that Mr. Ridenour authored all or part of these documents. In considering this argument in an earlier case, we held that a requester's status as an author of requested documents is irrelevant to our review under the FOIA. W.F. Lawless, 13 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,540 (1985). Subsequently, the Supreme Court held that the "identity of the requesting party" has "no bearing on the merits" of a FOIA request with the exception of certain cases involving a claim of privilege. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 771. Consequently, Mr. Ridenour's argument is without merit.

D. Failure of OIG to Issue a Determination Regarding Document Nos. 4, 5 and 6

Mr. Ridenour challenges OIG's failure to issue a determination regarding Document Nos. 4, 5 and 6 within the mandated deadline of 10 days as provided by the FOIA.(5) OIG, in its Determination Letter, stated that it had referred the documents to the DOE offices from which they originated so that those offices could issue Mr. Ridenour a determination.

With regard to Mr. Ridenour's argument, we find that we do not have jurisdiction to decide this issue. OHA jurisdiction in FOIA Appeals extends only to cases where the Authorizing Official has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request . . . or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees . . . .

10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a). As to Document Nos. 4, 5 and 6, no determination has been made by a DOE office. Consequently, until a determination is made regarding those documents, we have no jurisdiction to consider a FOIA Appeal concerning those documents. When Mr. Ridenour receives a determination regarding those documents, he may then submit an Appeal to us. (6)

E. OIG Failure to Provide Copies of Documents Authored by Mr. Ridenour

In his Appeal, Mr. Ridenour asserts that OIG was inconsistent in providing copies of only some of the responsive documents of which he was the author. Specifically, Mr. Ridenour states that he was provided two of the responsive documents (Document Nos. 22 and 24) he authored in whole or in part but was not provided the 18 other responsive documents he authored. With respect to this issue, OIG informs us that it generally does not provide copies of documents authored by a FOIA requester since the requester already has such documents in his or her possession. However, OIG did provide Document Nos. 22 and 24 to Mr. Ridenour because each document contained information not written by Mr. Ridenour. See Memorandum from Pamela Langer, Attorney, OIG, to Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (May 13, 1998).

We believe that OIG's policy regarding documents originating from a FOIA requester in most instances reflects the wishes of the requester. However, in this case, the requester apparently seeks copies of all responsive documents, even those he authored. We can find no provision of the FOIA that would permit an agency not to make a determination regarding such documents. Consequently, on remand, OIG should issue a determination regarding Document Nos. 9-21, 23, 25, 26, 32 and 33.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by David E. Ridenour on May 6, 1998, Case No. VFA-0411, is hereby granted in part as set forth in Paragraph (2).

(2) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Office of Inspector General for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Andrew Lee Fuller

Date of Filing: April 27, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0412

On April 27, 1998, Andrew Lee Fuller filed an Appeal from a March 24, 1998 determination of the Privacy Act Officer of the Office of Public Affairs of the Department of Energy's (DOE) Albuquerque Operations Office (Privacy Act Officer). The Privacy Act Officer issued that determination in response to Mr. Fuller's request for information filed under the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. The Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office to release the requested information.

Background

Mr. Fuller filed a request under the Privacy Act in which he sought copies of his complete personnel security file XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX. He also requested all "background investigation documents," and all correspondence between DOE headquarters or DOE Albuquerque offices and the DOE Personnel Security Division. On February 11, 1998, the Privacy Act Officer provided 85 responsive documents XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXX Following these recommendations, the Privacy Act Officer requested that Mr. Fuller XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX Mr. Fuller. Since Mr. Fuller did not provide XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX the Privacy Act Officer denied this portion of Mr. Fuller's request. Mr. Fuller contends that the DOE cannot withhold any information it considered in making a determination regarding DOE clearance issues.

Analysis

The Privacy Act requires, inter alia, that each federal agency permit an individual to gain access to information pertaining to him contained in any system of records the agency maintained. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information can be retrieved by using the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.2(m). Pursuant to the authority granted in XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX, the DOE regulations state that if a Privacy XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXX the Privacy Act Officer may ask the individual XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXX.

Since the personnel security file XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX allows retrieval of information using the name of the individual, we find that it is a system of records pursuant to the Privacy Act. Also, we have confirmed that the appropriate DOE XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX. See May 15, 1998 and May 18, 1998 Fax Transmissions from Jim Snyder, Albuquerque Operations Office, to Len Tao, Attorney, Office of Hearings and Appeals. Since Mr. Fuller failed to respond to the Privacy Act Officer's XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX the DOE had sufficient grounds to deny Mr. Fuller's request XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX Accordingly, we must deny Mr. Fuller's appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Andrew Lee Fuller on April 27, 1998, Case Number VFA-0412, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552a(g)(1)(B), (g)(5). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

On May 4, 1998, Gary S. Foster (Foster) filed five Appeals with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to five determinations that DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR) issued to him on April 6, 1998. Those determinations concerned five requests for information that Foster submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeals were granted, DOE/OR would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

Foster, according to his Appeals, is an employee at DOE/OR's Y-12 manufacturing facility who suffers from chronic beryllium disease. Foster contends that his disease was caused by exposure to beryllium that was used in Y-12 machining operations in the past. Letters from Foster to Director, OHA (May 4, 1998) (Appeals). On February 7, 1998, Foster submitted six FOIA requests to DOE/OR. In five of these requests, Foster asked for all documents relating to any beryllium transaction between DOE and any of the following five companies: Ceradyne, Cercom Quality Products, Loral American Beryllium (also known as Lockheed Martin Beryllium), General Ceramics (also known as National Beryllium) and Eagle-Picher. Letters from Foster to Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, DOE/OR (February 7, 1998). These companies supplied beryllium to DOE/OR for use in machining. In the sixth request, Foster asked for copies of DOE-required reports pertaining to beryllium that were generated by General Ceramics from 1949 through 1998. Id. DOE/OR promptly located material responsive to the sixth request, and forwarded those documents to Foster. However, DOE/OR could not find any responsive documents relating to the first five requests.

Letters from DOE/OR to Foster (April 6, 1998). On May 4, 1998, Foster filed the present Appeals, challenging the adequacy of DOE/OR's search with regards to his first five requests.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeals, we contacted DOE/OR to ascertain the scope of the search it performed for the responsive documents. The DOE/OR FOIA Officer informed us that, in response to an April 1997 discovery request stemming from litigation against the agency, all DOE/OR employees had searched for beryllium documents and forwarded all responsive material to the FOIA office. DOE/OR declassified the responsive documents and compiled them into a discovery response, a copy of which was sent to the DOE/OR public reading room. Upon receipt of Foster's request, the FOIA officer reviewed the index of beryllium documents in the reading room and released several documents that were responsive to the sixth request. In addition, the FOIA Officer informed us that she also searched 3 boxes of beryllium information located in her office awaiting indexing and transfer to the reading room.(1) Thus, according to the FOIA Officer, all offices in DOE/OR have disclosed any relevant beryllium documents in their possession. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock, DOE/OR FOIA Officer, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (May 18, 1998).

We find that DOE/OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover all beryllium-related documents in that office. All employees were directed to disclose relevant documents to the FOIA office in 1997, and these documents were sent to the reading room. The FOIA Officer did not request a new search because beryllium operations were discontinued at DOE/OR prior to 1997 and there have been no new beryllium-related transactions (and thus no new documents created) between DOE and the named companies since then. The FOIA Officer stated that she located the responsive material related to General Ceramics/National Beryllium in the reading room. Thus, it was reasonable for the FOIA Officer to search the public reading room for documents responsive to Foster's request. As stated above, the FOIA does not require an exhaustive search, only a reasonable one. On the basis of the facts provided above, we find that DOE/OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents. Accordingly, we must deny Foster's Appeals.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeals filed on May 8, 1998 by Gary S. Foster, OHA Case Nos. VFA-0413, VFA-0414, VFA-0415, VFA-0416, and VFA-0417, are hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-041927 DOE ¶ 80,144

June 8, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Applicant: Jones, Walker Waechter, Poitevent Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P.

Case Number: VFA-0419

Date of Filing: May 6, 1998

On May 6, 1998, Jones, Walker Waechter, Poitevent Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P., filed an Appeal from a determination issued by the Federal Energy Technology Center (FETC) of the Department of Energy under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA). 5 U.S.C. § 552. The firm sought from FETC, the original supervising entity, documents on the Mound Site Plume Treatment System contract at the Rocky Flats Environmental Technology Site. Before issuing the contract, FETC gave contract authority to the Rocky Flats Field Office (RFFO). FETC later transferred the firm's FOIA request to RFFO. During the appeal of RFFO's determination, FETC found responsive documents submitted before transfer of its authority. Jones, Walker, Waechter, Poitevent, Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P., 27 DOE ¶ 80,127 at 80,564, n.* (1998).

In its March 31, 1998 determination letter, FETC withheld all documents under Exemption 4, which permits withholding of "trade secrets and confidential or financial information." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). FETC found that because RFFO had not let the new contract, release of the information could cause harm "to any future competition for the work." FETC informs us that RFFO recently awarded the contract. Because the factual predicate for the FETC determination no longer applies, we will remand this matter to FETC for a new determination. See STAND of Amarillo, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,105 at 80,513 (1996).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Jones, Walker Waechter, Poitevent Carrère & Denègre, L.L.P., is hereby granted, remanded to the Federal Energy Technology Center for a new determination, and denied in all other respects.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0420, 27 DOE ¶80,146

June 17, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Goodell, Stratton, Edmonds & Palmer, L.L.P.

Date of Filing: May 22, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0420

On May 22, 1998, Goodell, Stratton, Edwards & Palmer, L.L.P., filed an Appeal from a determination issued on April 21, 1998, by the Department of Energy's Southwestern Power Administration (SWPA). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appellant challenges the adequacy of SWPA's search for documents responsive to its request.

I. Background

On March 26, 1998, the Appellant requested from SWPA "any and all documents which reference anticipated frequency or time of use for all easements above Pensacola Dam along the Neosho/Grand River up to the Kansas line between elevation 750 and 760 ngvd [National Geodetic Vertical Datum, a standard used in the measurement of elevation from sea level]." Letter from N. Larry Bork, Goodell, Stratton, Edmonds & Palmer, L.L.P., to Marti Ayers, FOIA Officer, SPA (March 26, 1998). SWPA issued a determination on April 21, 1998, in which it stated that it had searched its records and located no documents responsive to the Appellant's request. Letter from Michael A. Deihl, Administrator, SWPA, to N. Larry Bork (April 21, 1998).

II. Analysis

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

According to the Appellant, the federal government, through various agencies, operated the Pensacola Dam between November 1941 and September 1946, after which control was returned to an Oklahoma state agency. Letter from N. Larry Bork to Fred Romanski, National Archives (April 30, 1998). The Appellant further asserts that, during the period of federal control, SWPA was responsible for the acquisition of flowage easements in connection with the operation of the dam.(1)

In responding to the Appellant's request, the SWPA FOIA Officer contacted the Realty Officer within SWPA's Division of Acquisition and Property, which was unable to locate any responsive documents. The Realty Officer subsequently informed the FOIA Officer that, "[s]ince disposition of land ownership records is based on disposition of the land, most likely the records related to those acquisitions were disposed of several years ago." Electronic mail from Linda Saults, Realty Officer, Division of Acquisition and Property, SWPA, to Marti Ayers, FOIA Officer, SWPA (May 11, 1998). Subsequent to the filing of the present Appeal, the SWPA FOIA Officer received responses from SWPA's Division of Engineering and Planning and Division of Scheduling and Operations indicating that neither division possessed documents responsive to the Appellant's request. Electronic mail from Ken Legg, Director, Division of Engineering and Planning, SWPA, to Marti Ayers (May 11, 1998); Electronic mail from Jerry Johnson, Director, Division of Scheduling and Operations, SWPA, to Marti Ayers (May 11, 1998). If responsive documents are still in the possession of SWPA, the divisions which the FOIA Officer consulted appear to us to be those within SWPA where such documents would likely be located.

SWPA also gave the Appellant access to the Federal Records Center in Fort Worth, Texas, authorizing the Appellant "to personally inspect and copy [SWPA] records pertaining to Grand Lake/Neosho River/Pensacola Dam, except documents and files, if any, identified as privileged attorney client communications." Letter from Laurence Yadon, Chief Counsel, SWPA, to Pete Scholls, Federal Records Center (March 31, 1998). The Appellant informed SWPA that his inspection revealed no documents responsive to his request.

We find that the search for responsive documents coordinated by the SWPA FOIA Officer extended to the Divisions within SWPA where she reasonably believed those documents would be located if those documents still exist and were in the possession of SWPA. We therefore conclude that SWPA's search was reasonably calculated to uncover the documents the Appellant sought. Accordingly, the present Appeal will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Goodell, Stratton, Edwards & Palmer, L.L.P., Case Number VFA-0420, is hereby denied.

Case No. VFA-0421, 27 DOE ¶ 80,152

August 11, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers

Date of Filing:June 8, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0421

On June 8, 1998, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on March 26, 1998, by the Savannah River Operations Office (SR) of the Department of Energy (DOE).(1) In that determination, SR released various relevant records and withheld other information identified as responsive to the Appellant's July 30, 1997 Request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA). SR charged $226.90 for search and review. In an earlier determination, SR denied the Appellant's request for a fee waiver. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information, conduct a further search, and order SR to either grant the Appellant a fee waiver or reduce the amount the Appellant has been ordered to pay for search and review costs.

The FOIA requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the federal government generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). In addition to this requirement, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure will nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In addition, the FOIA and DOE regulations promulgated thereunder establish procedures for performing searches for, and waiving applicable fees for, information responsive to a request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(i); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9.

I. Background

On July 30, 1997, the Appellant submitted a FOIA request to SR seeking the following nine items:

(1) a copy of any and all correspondence, memos, directives, electronic mail, etc., concerning the IBEW and [its] organizing activity generated by Wackenhut Services, Inc. (WSI) and/or the DOE Savannah River site since October 1996;

(2) a copy of any and all flyers, letters, brochures, buttons, training plans, videos and other data or material used by WSI to counter our efforts and the cost to produce or procure each item;

(3) a copy of the list of anti-Union consultants provided to WSI management by the DOE;

(4) a copy of the contract between WSI and the anti-Union consultants they retained including their names and addresses;

(5) a copy of the contract between WSI and the law firm retained to represent them during the organizing, election and post-election period;

(6) a copy of any and all documents showing each expense charged by the consultants and attorneys including salary, fees, per diem, travel, lodging, expenses, materials, etc.;

(7) a copy of any and all documents such as financial records, requests for expenditures, vouchers, payroll records, timecards, travel expenses, receipts, etc. for moneys spent for all supervisor training, [and] time spent on the clock by the "Vote No" Committee while influencing their co-workers and the employees during their "captive audience" anti-Union informational meetings with the supervisors;

(8) a copy of the request from WSI to DOE for employees' salary increases and /or bonuses for the current year and DOE's response granting same;

(9) a copy of any and all documents showing how all of the above costs were passed on to the DOE.

Letter from Appellant to Pauline Conner, Freedom of Information Act Officer, SR (July 30, 1997) (Request Letter).

In its Request Letter, the Appellant also requested a fee waiver. On August 4, 1997, SR determined that the Appellant was ineligible for a fee waiver. Letter from Pauline Conner to Appellant (August 4, 1997) (Fee Waiver Determination Letter). In a September 11, 1997 letter, SR estimated the cost of the search to be performed at $1,330.52. SR explained that it had, discretionarily, agreed to absorb 50 hours of search cost for Request Item 1, but added that the Appellant would still be required to assure SR that it would pay the total remaining estimated cost of $290.00. The Appellant responded in an October 6, 1997 letter that it would make that assurance, with the proviso that it expected the charges to be much less than estimated and that they expected a large volume of information to be released.

In its March 26, 1998 Determination Letter, SR released approximately 78 documents (362 pages) to the Appellant, and withheld or redacted approximately 35 documents, citing FOIA Exemptions 4, 5 and 6. The majority of the withheld documents at issue consist of legal billing records and expense reports. All of the withheld and released documents were listed in an attached document (list of Response Documents). SR further determined that some requested documents were not agency records. It also withheld some responsive videos but failed to state a reason for this withholding. SR charged the Appellant $226.90 for fees, including search and review costs. Letter from Greg Rudy, Authorizing Official, SR, to Appellant (March 26, 1998) (Determination Letter). On June 8, 1998, the Appellant filed the present Appeal in which it contends that SR's refusal to release withheld information was improper, SR's search was inadequate, and that SR should have granted the Appellant a fee waiver or alternatively reduced its fees. The Appellant is also appealing an earlier August 29, 1997 FOIA determination by SR of a different request.(2) Appeal Letter from Appellant to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (June 2, 1998) (Appeal Letter).

II. Analysis

A. Earlier Request

The Appellant failed to appeal the earlier August 29, 1997 determination within the thirty day regulatory deadline. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a). Normally, this Office would request that the Appellant submit a new request for that information and receive another determination. The Appellant could then appeal that determination in a timely manner. But since SR has agreed that no administrative or other interests will be harmed by allowing the Appellant to appeal the August 29, 1997 determination at this point, and we are obligated to issue a decision in any event on the appeal of the March 26, 1998 determination, we will consider the appeal of the earlier action as a matter of our discretion.

The August 29, 1997 determination was issued in response to a July 23, 1997 request for information. That request was for “a copy of the exact salary (not range) paid to each non-exempt employee by name and classification of those listed on the Excelsior list [enclosed] provided to the Union by WSI in February of this year.” SR responded that it was releasing one document but it possessed no other responsive documents. It stated that WSI, a DOE contractor, possessed responsive documents. SR found that these documents are neither agency records nor subject to release. SR determined that pursuant to its contract with WSI, WSI owns this information and it is therefore not subject to release under the contractor records regulation, 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e).

The Appellant asserted in its Appeal that all taxpayer-funded records are subject to release under the FOIA. This assertion is incorrect. Our threshold inquiry in FOIA matters is whether any of the requested records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f) (describing the scope of the term “agency” under the FOIA). Records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that no responsive “agency records” exist at SR and that none of the records is subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis the courts have fashioned for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as WSI, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595- 96.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The Supreme Court has identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. The Supreme Court ruled that for FOIA purposes, an organization will be considered a federal agency if its day-to-day operations are supervised by the federal government. Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Pursuant to its contract with the DOE, WSI is responsible for providing security at the Savannah River Site. While the DOE obtained WSI’s services and exercises general control over the contract work, it does not supervise WSI’s day-to-day operations. See Printout of Electronic Mail Message from Pauline Conner to Dawn Goldstein (June 15, 1998). We therefore conclude that WSI is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although WSI is not an “agency” for the purposes of the FOIA, its records could be considered "agency records" if the DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time the Appellant made his FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989) (Tax Analysts). In its Appeal, the Appellant argues that Response Document 66, a letter from SR to WSI asking for responsive records, demonstrates that the DOE has or had possession of additional responsive records, thereby making them “agency records.” SR has informed us that contrary to the Appellant’s contention, WSI never turned over to the agency the records requested by SR in Response Document 66. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Pauline Conner and Dawn Goldstein (June 11, 1998). It therefore does not appear that DOE obtained or controlled the WSI records at issue. Consequently, these documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with the DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, the DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1) (DOE contractor records regulation). We therefore next look to the contract between the DOE and WSI to determine the status of the requested records. The relevant contract provision states “All personnel records relating to Contractor’s employees, including salary records, references, training records, performance or promotability appraisals, disciplinary actions, medical records, Employee Assistance Program records, or any other personnel related records, . . . generated or retained in the course of performance of this contract shall be the property of the Contractor. . . [emphasis in original].” Contract No. DE-AC09-93SR18292, Modification No. A011, Clause H.16. Since the Appellant requested salary records, SR’s August 29, 1997 determination that these records are owned by WSI and therefore not subject to the DOE contractor records regulation was correct.

B. Fee Waiver

Regarding the Appellant’s instant request for fee waiver, we note that this request is very similar to another fee waiver request it filed. See I.B.E.W., 26 DOE ¶ 80,153 (1997). In that case, we held that because the Appellant has a commercial interest in the requested material and the Appellant’s primary interest in the information is for the benefit of its membership, it is not entitled to a fee waiver. That earlier request for documents seeks material similar to that requested currently. Moreover, the Appellant has made the same arguments in favor of the fee waiver that we responded to in the earlier case. We see no reason to depart from our analysis set forth in that decision. Accordingly, we find that the Appellant is not entitled to a fee waiver.(3)

In its request and its Appeal, the Appellant requests that the agency calculate the difference between savings DOE could gain from stopping alleged fraud and the amount that the Appellant could hope to gain from exposing the alleged fraud, in order to justify its position that its interest is not primarily commercial. We note that the FOIA does not require this type of quantitative analysis. However, the FOIA does require an analysis similar to the one we performed in the earlier I.B.E.W. decision when we balanced the Appellant’s commercial interest against the identified public interest. See I.B.E.W., 26 DOE at 80,672. In that balancing, this Office found that disclosure of the requested information is primarily in the commercial interest of the requester. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii). SR has made the same finding regarding the current request. See Letter from Pauline Conner to Appellant (August 4, 1997). Therefore, we find that SR correctly evaluated the public and commercial interests at stake, and this argument is not grounds for reversal.

C. Reasonableness of Fees

The DOE regulations provide for fees to be assessed to cover the “full allowable direct costs incurred” of responding to requests for information. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9. Pursuant to the FOIA, the DOE has issued regulations "specifying the schedule of fees applicable to the processing of requests . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(i). Under this fee schedule, the DOE charges for manual searches at the salary rate(s) (i.e. basic pay plus 16 percent) of the employees making the search. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(1). In addition, "[t]he DOE will charge requesters who are seeking documents for commercial use for time spent reviewing records to determine whether they are exempt from mandatory disclosure." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(3).

The Appellant makes several arguments that the fees assessed in this case should be reduced. We reject each of these arguments. First, the Appellant argues that it should not be charged as a commercial use requester. The Appellant is incorrect. As we found in the earlier I.B.E.W. decision, the Appellant has a strong commercial interest in requesting this information. Therefore, it was properly classified as a commercial requester.

Second, the Appellant argues that the amount of documents generated does not appear substantial enough to justify the $226.90 fee charged. The Appellant's complaint regarding the number of responsive documents received is not relevant to whether appropriate fees were charged. There can never be any assurance that a FOIA request will yield any releasable documents or that the requester will find the documents released to be useful. Fees are not charged because the requester may derive a benefit from the documents, but because the government expends money to process the request. See Association of Public Agency Customers, 25 DOE ¶ 80,200 at 80,749 (1996) (sixteen pages released and $1,145.63 in fees found to be properly assessed); ITech, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,169 at 80,678 (1996). In fact, DOE regulations specifically provide that fees will be assessed even if no responsive documents are located. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(b)(6). Here, the Appellant in fact received 362 pages. Moreover, SR discretionarily chose not to charge for the first 50 hours of search time for Request Item 1. Its charges were actually considerably less than SR estimated.

We contacted SR to determine how it calculated the fees charged to the Appellant. In this case, SR charged $167.04 for search time, based on 10 hours of search time by both clerical and non-clerical employees (for the remaining eight request items), $41.76 for two hours of review time, and $18.10 for photocopying charges. Given the size of the Appellant's request, the amount of search and review time was reasonable.(4)

Third, the Appellant asserts that it should not be charged for duplicates, heavily redacted pages (which the Appellant called "blank pages"), or non-responsive information such as Appellant- generated material. Regarding the Appellant's complaints regarding the duplicate pages, SR informed us that it photocopied all enclosures to responsive documents in an effort to be complete and to demonstrate that it was not hiding any responsive documents. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Pauline Conner and Dawn Goldstein (June 10, 1998). In addition, we note that it would have increased the review time spent, and thus the Appellant's fees, if SR had taken the time to search for duplicates. SR also heavily redacted some of the pages. By releasing the redacted version, we find that SR correctly showed to the Appellant the precise amount of redacted material, as is required under the Electronic Freedom of Information Act Amendments of 1996. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Therefore, the portion of the fees due to duplicate and redacted pages was reasonable.

With regard to the Appellant-generated material, we note that Item 1 of the Appellant's request asked for "any and all correspondence . . . concerning the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (I.B.E.W.) and [its] organizing activity generated by Wackenhut Services, Inc. (WSI) and/or the DOE Savannah River site since October 1996 [emphasis added]." SR explained to us that the Appellant-generated material was part of their correspondence files and therefore SR included the 80 to 90 pages of this material in its response. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn Goldstein, Pauline Conner and Timothy Fischer, Office of Chief Counsel, SR (July 22, 1998). We find SR's inclusion of this material to be unreasonable because the Appellant's request specifically excluded this material. Further, it should have been fairly simple to remove these pages. Therefore, we are remanding this portion of the Appeal so that SR can reduce the amount it charged the Appellant for photocopying pages generated by neither SR nor WSI. The remainder of the fees that SR imposed in this case were proper.

D. Withholding of Videos

In its determination, SR withheld several videos responsive to Request Item 2 and informed the Appellant of the private entity from whom it could purchase copies. However, SR did not provide in that determination its reason for withholding these videos. Both the FOIA and the DOE regulations require reasonably specific justifications for the withholding of documents or portions of documents. See, e.g., Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); Digital City

Communications, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,657 (1997); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1). Those DOE regulations provide that a denial of records will contain the following: "A statement of reason for the denial, containing a reference to the specific exemption under the Freedom of Information Act authorizing the withholding of the record and a brief explanation of how the exemption applies to the record withheld, and a statement why a discretionary release is not appropriate." We are therefore remanding this portion of the Appeal for a further determination on this issue. (5)

E. Adequacy of the Search

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

We contacted SR to determine how it conducted the search for each item of the request. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Timothy Fischer and Dawn Goldstein (June 22, 1998). SR conducted a search of its own Office of Chief Counsel, Chief Financial Office (consisting of the Finance Division, Financial Evaluation Division and the Planning and Budget Division), the Contracts Management Division and the Office of Safeguards and Security (the program office having oversight responsibility for WSI). See Memorandum from Timothy Fischer to Dawn Goldstein (June 12, 1998); Record of Telephone Conversation between Donna Brown, Paralegal, Office of Chief Counsel, SR, and Dawn Goldstein (June 29, 1998). In addition, SR supervised a search of the following WSI offices: Environmental Protection Department, Accounting, Site Security Support Department, Zone Operations Training Department, Zone Operations, Office of Deputy Assistant General Manager for Administration, Dispute Resolution and Compliance, Security Programs and Projects Department, Training Department and Labor Relations. See Printout of Electronic Mail Message from Pauline Conner to Dawn Goldstein (June 12, 1998).

SR later informed us that it had mistakenly failed to search a file held by SR's Office of Chief Counsel which appears to be responsive to the July 30, 1997 request. The file consists, inter alia, of additional attorney invoices, invoices by the labor consultant, SR/WSI correspondence, National Labor Relations Board documents, settlement-related documents and a letter referred to in Response Document 6 from WSI's outside counsel, Mr. Savitz, to Ms. Lucy Knowles, attorney at SR's Office of Chief Counsel. SR is reviewing the contents of this file and plans to issue a determination regarding that file after this Decision is issued.(6) See Record of Telephone Conversation between Donna Brown and Dawn Goldstein (July 1, 1998). In addition, in its Appeal, the Appellant noted that an SR litigation manual was referred to Response Document 103 and asked that SR release the manual to it. Since the filing of this Appeal, SR has released the litigation manual to the Appellant.

Next, we will examine each of the request items for which the Appellant has made a specific argument regarding the adequacy of SR's and WSI's search.

1. Request Item 1

SR's search for Request Item 1, concerning correspondence and other documents pertaining to the union, generally appears to have been adequate. However, regarding WSI's search, the contractor has stated that it did not turn over documents responsive to Request Item 1 if it had already released these documents to the Appellant during the union drive. See Memorandum from B. Weber, Labor Relations, WSI, to Timothy Fischer (November 4, 1997) (WSI Response). This limitation was inappropriate. WSI is obligated to release responsive, DOE-owned, non-exempt documents that have been requested under the FOIA.

Therefore, we must remand this issue to SR so that WSI can conduct a complete search. SR must then determine whether, under the applicable ownership of records provision, DOE owns these documents.(7) If DOE owns these documents, SR must then determine whether these documents are exempt under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1), and whether WSI claims a privilege recognized under federal or state law and that there is a reasonable basis for that privilege claim. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3 (e)(2); Sangre de Cristo Animal Protection, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,121 at 80,552 (1995). On remand, SR shall make a determination on these issues.

Also regarding Request Item 1, the Appellant stated that it had not received deposition transcripts referred to in some of the released records such as Response Documents 73 and 103. SR informed us, after a thorough search of the logical places for such transcripts, it does not possess them. Nor does WSI possess these transcripts. Instead, these documents are solely in the possession of WSI's outside counsel. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Timothy Fischer, Pauline Conner and Dawn Goldstein (June 29, 1998). Since the terms of the contractor records regulation do not include the records of a subcontractor, we find that the FOIA and 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3 do not apply to these records. Apart from the issues discussed above, WSI's search for Request Item 1 was adequate.

2. Request Item 3

It appears that the offices of SR that would logically possess the list of labor consultants were adequately searched. However, WSI's response to this item of the request was that it had no " ?anti- Union consultant' nor was any such list provided us by DOE." See WSI Response. WSI appears to object to the Appellant's description of the labor consultant ultimately hired by WSI, Mr. Sommerville, as an "anti-Union" consultant, and therefore WSI did not search for any documents relating to his hiring. We believe that SR should have consulted with the Appellant to ascertain whether the Appellant was indeed referring to a list containing Mr. Sommerville's name, or any other list containing names of labor consultants, and then notified WSI of this clarification. Cf. 10 C.F.R. §1004.4(c)(2). We shall therefore remand this portion of the Appeal for a further search by WSI.

3. Request Items 4 and 5

It does not appear that SR ever possessed a copy of either the WSI contract with the labor consultant, or the contract between WSI and the law firm it retained. It does appear that these records exist and are in the possession of WSI, notwithstanding WSI's response that it possesses no contracts with any "anti-union consultants." SR has also never determined whether either contract is subject to release under the DOE contractor records regulation, 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Timothy Fischer and Dawn Goldstein (June 22, 1998). From our reading of the applicable ownership of records provision, WSI does not own these contracts. On remand, SR shall make a determination whether these contracts are subject to release under the DOE contractor records regulation.

4. Request Item 7

SR released no documents responsive to Request Item 7 pertaining to WSI expenditures on behalf of what the Appellant called the "Vote No" committee. WSI stated that it uses "no separate coding" to mark the time cards of employees who attended the training sessions referred to in the request. WSI also stated, "The Company did not knowingly pay for time spent by the voluntary committee referred to by the IBEW as the ?Vote No' committee and, as such, we have none of the documentation requested." See WSI Response.

Based on our review and in view of the way the Appellant formulated its request, we believe that DOE and WSI performed an adequate search for this item of the request. However, we suggest that the Appellant, with the aid of SR, formulate a new request that could be the basis for a further search. For instance, if the Appellant makes a new request for records pertaining to a specific period of time or specific meetings prior to the union election, WSI may be able to find responsive records.(8)

5. Request Item 8

This item concerned WSI's request to SR for salary increases for WSI employees, and SR's response to this request. In its determination, SR explained that it released a responsive document to the Appellant on August 29, 1997 as a result of a previous FOIA request.(9) This document contains various tables and is entitled, "WSI-SRS 1997 Salary Increase Fund." In addition, SR explained that other responsive documents that WSI owned and possessed are not subject to release under DOE's contractor records regulation. Finally, in response to the instant FOIA request, SR released Response Document 32, "Calendar Year 1997 Salary Increase Chronology," of which a small portion was redacted, as discussed below.

The Appellant notes that several other salary-related documents are referred to in this chronology, none of which was released or listed in the Response Documents list. These documents include a November 25, 1996 proposal by WSI, another document submitted by WSI on December 18, 1996, a January 22, 1997 approval letter from DOE, proposed matrix guidelines submitted by WSI on February 19, 1997 and SR's approval of the matrices on February 20, 1997. It is unclear whether any of these documents are responsive to the Appellant's request. We suggest that the Appellant make a new request for each of these items. We nevertheless find that WSI's and SR's search was adequate for this item.

6. Request Item 9

This Office consulted with the Appellant in order to clarify what was meant by Request Item 9, which pertains to documents related to reimbursements by DOE to WSI for costs pertaining to the union election. The Appellant specified that this item was meant to include documents showing reimbursements by DOE to WSI for the following expenditures: labor consultant bills; law firm bills; the "Vote No" Committee (Request Item 7); and any other WSI expenditures on behalf of fighting the union organizing campaign later reimbursed by DOE. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Appellant and Dawn Goldstein (July 6, 1998). While DOE has released redacted versions of the law firm bills, it has not yet done so for the labor consultant's bills. As explained earlier, SR is currently making a determination regarding the releasibility of these bills. In addition, we have upheld the adequacy of WSI's and SR's search regarding Item 7. We are therefore remanding this portion of the Appeal in order that SR may issue its determination regarding the labor consultant's bills.

F. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 protects "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). Exemption 5 is generally recognized as encompassing certain distinct privileges, including the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work- product privilege, and the governmental deliberative process privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. DOE, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980). In the present case, SR relied on the work-product privilege of Exemption 5 to withhold Response Document 56.

However, this document does not meet the threshold test of Exemption 5, that the document be inter-agency or intra-agency. This document was prepared by a Mr. Brian Weber, a labor relations employee (but not an attorney) for WSI. Mr. Weber prepared this document at the request of Mr. Savitz, WSI's outside counsel, so that Mr. Savitz could learn the facts regarding several issues in litigation before the National Labor Relations Board. We note that in William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,698 (1997), this Office said that Exemption 5 could protect billing records generated by outside counsel and sent to a DOE contractor. However, in that case, we noted that the billing records at issue there were used by DOE to monitor the litigation as part of its decision-making process and to determine whether it might be necessary to impose additional controls. Id. That is not the case here, since the DOE never obtained the document at issue. Thus, because DOE was not involved in preparing this document in any way, and it is not an inter-agency or intra-agency document, Exemption 5 does not apply and cannot be used to withhold it. We will therefore remand this issue so that SR may either release the document or determine that another exemption such as Exemption 4 justifies its withholding.(10)

G. Exemption 4

SR withheld several documents under Exemption 4, including the labor consultant's normal billing rates, a portion of Response Document 32 and portions of attorney invoices. Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (a) trade secrets or (b) information that is (1) "commercial" or "financial," (2) "obtained from a person," and (3) "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765, 766 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). Clearly, a request for payment for services rendered, a labor consultant's normal rates and a document concerning salary increases are "commercial" within the meaning of Exemption 4. In addition, the information submitted by WSI was obtained from a "person," as required by Exemption 4, since corporations are deemed "persons" for purposes of that Exemption. See Ronson Management Corp., 19 DOE ¶ 80,117 (1989). Moreover, we also consider the information submitted by the Savitz law firm to be obtained from a "person." See Nadler v. FDIC, 92 F.3d 93, 95 (2d Cir. 1996) (term "person" includes partnerships (relying upon definition found in Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 551(2))).

1. "Confidential" documents

In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (i) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (ii) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. Id. at 770; see also Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information that is provided to an agency voluntarily is considered "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. Because the information at issue in this case was submitted as part of a contract between the DOE and WSI, this information is not considered to have been submitted voluntarily and is therefore considered "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. Cf. Nayar & Company, P.C., 23 DOE ¶ 80,185 at 80,710 (1994) (information submitted in response to request for proposal).(11)

a. The labor consultant's normal rates

SR explained that it withheld the labor consultant's rates as confidential business information pursuant to Exemption 4, not under the attorney-client privilege as the Appellant appears to believe. WSI's only statement regarding this issue was that the rates should be withheld as "proprietary information" under Exemption 4. See WSI Response. Both the FOIA and the DOE regulations require reasonably specific justifications for the withholding of documents or portions of documents, as discussed above. Thus, a FOIA determination that material should be withheld pursuant to Exemption 4 because its disclosure is likely to cause substantial harm must include the reasons for believing such harm will result to the competitive position of the person from whom the information is obtained. Larson Associated, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,204 (1996); Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993).

In this case, WSI could, but did not, provide any explanation as to why release of the rates would likely cause substantial harm to the competitive position of either it or the labor consultant. Alternately, SR could provide an explanation why the release of specific information within the proposal would impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future. See Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In making the latter determination, SR should keep in mind that conclusory allegations of harm do not suffice to protect information from disclosure under Exemption 4. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co. v. Peña, No. 92-2780, slip op. at 13 (D.D.C. Sept. 2, 1993) (Westlaw, DCT database) (submitters are "required to make assertions with some level of detail as to the likelihood and the specific nature of the competitive harm they predict"). Since neither SR nor WSI provided a reasonably specific justification, we are remanding this aspect of the Appeal so that SR may determine if adequate justification exists. In addition, if SR finds that it believes that this material should be released, it should consult with Mr. Sommerville and WSI on their views regarding this matter. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11(f). SR should then either release the withheld material or issue a new determination setting forth a specific explanation as to why Exemption 4 applies to the labor consultant's normal rates.

b. Response Document 32

SR released Response Document 32, the "Calendar Year 1997 Salary Increase Chronology," in response to Request Item 8. SR redacted a portion of the document pursuant to Exemption 4. As with the labor consultant's rates, SR failed to provide any explanation as to why this portion is exempt. We therefore shall remand this aspect of the Appeal so that SR can perform the type of analysis described in the proceeding section.

2. "Privileged" documents

Several of the withheld documents are invoices for legal fees incurred by WSI's attorneys. WSI forwarded the invoices to the DOE for payment in accordance with the provisions of the DOE's contract with WSI. SR withheld portions of these documents under the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work-product privilege. The attorney-client privilege protects "confidential communications between an attorney and his client relating to a legal matter for which the client has sought professional advice." Mead Data Cent., Inc. v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242, 252 (D.C. Cir. 1977).(12)

SR released the rates billed for each item of service, the dollar figure shown for the total services rendered in the billing period, and the expenses charged on the bills prepared by the firm. SR also released in Response Documents 73 and 103 the identities of the partner, Mr. Savitz, who worked on this case, his rates for counseling and litigation, and the identity of the associate, Mr. Timothy O'Rourke, who worked on this matter. SR also released in Response Document 95 the fact that a paralegal would be working on this case and that person's rate. The withheld portions of the documents consist of the total amount of time spent by the firm on the case, the dates services were rendered, a description of the services rendered, the attorney who worked on the case, the amount of hours billed for each service, and the cost for each service. SR also withheld several invoices for travel expenses incurred by the attorneys.

Some withheld portions of the documents consist of information protected by the attorney work- product privilege or the attorney-client privilege. Specifically, those portions include descriptions of the legal services provided, the cost of each service and the amount of time spent by the attorneys in performing each service. The descriptions of the services provided reflect the legal theories and strategies of the attorneys. The time and cost figures reveal the relative importance attached to each task by the attorneys. For these reasons, we have previously determined that this type of information is subject to the attorney work-product privilege. C.D. Varnadore & Betty Freels, 24 DOE ¶ 80,123 at 80-557. We also note some of the Westlaw and Federal Express invoices were redacted to protect the attorney-client privilege of non-WSI clients of the law firms. We note that release of this information, since it is privileged attorney-client communication, would impair the ability of the government to obtain necessary information in the future. We also find that in applying each of the first four criteria listed in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11(f) to the facts of this case, this information should remain withheld. We therefore reject the Appellant's contention that SR improperly withheld those portions of the invoices pursuant to Exemption 4.

However, we find that SR cannot properly withhold some of the information contained in the attorney billing invoices using either the attorney-client privilege or the attorney work-product privilege. In addition to the information already disclosed, that information includes the total time on the matter spent by the firm within the given billing period, and amounts of expenses such as travel and telephone bills, withheld in Response Document 96.(13) Given the facts of this case, disclosure of this information would not reveal WSI's motive for seeking representation, litigation strategy, the specific nature of the services rendered by the attorneys or any privileged communications.

Moreover, we note that SR already released the identities of the attorneys working on this case, and their rates, most of which are different. Because SR also released the rate per service on the attorney invoices, SR has effectively released the identities of those attorneys whose rates are different. Therefore, it is required to release most of the initials shown in the "attorney or staff" column.(14) Releasing the initials of the paralegal who worked on this case would also reveal nothing that would harm the attorney-client or work-product privilege. Accordingly, we find that SR cannot withhold such information using the attorney-client privilege. Nor would release of this information reveal mental impressions, litigation strategy, conclusions or legal theories of the attorneys. Therefore, this information is not withholdable under the attorney work-product privilege. See C.D. Varnadore & Betty Freels, 24 DOE ¶ 80,123 at 80,556-57 (1994). We are therefore remanding this issue so that SR may either release the withheld material or find that another exemption applies.

3. Public Interest Analysis

The DOE regulations provide that material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is permitted by federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. However, in cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that can be withheld pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.(15)

III. Conclusion

We therefore uphold SR's earlier determination and its current determination regarding the Appellant's request for a fee waiver. We also find most of the fees SR charged to be reasonable. However, we find that we must remand certain aspects of this case so that SR can reduce the fees which it charged for photocopying and so that it can make a proper determination regarding the requested videos. In addition, SR has agreed to make a determination regarding a responsive file found in its Office of Chief Counsel. It and WSI must also conduct a further search for some of the items requested and SR must either release the Weber memorandum previously withheld under Exemption 5 or issue a determination stating another justification for withholding it. Finally, some portions of the attorney billing records, the labor consultant's normal rates, and the redacted portion of Response Document 32, withheld under Exemption 4, must either be released or a new determination must be issued stating that another exemption properly applies.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers on June 8, 1998, Case Number VFA-0421, is granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Savannah River Operations Office, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

George B. Breznay

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: August 11, 1998

(1) 1/ On May 8, 1998, this Office granted the Appellant an extension of time to submit this Appeal beyond the regulatory deadline of thirty calendar days after receipt of the determination letter. See Letter from Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) to Appellant; 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a). In addition, due to the complexity and number of matters discussed herein, this Office sought an extension of time to issue this Decision beyond the regulatory deadline of twenty working days after receipt of the Appeal. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(d). The Appellant had no objections. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Appellant and Dawn Goldstein, Staff Attorney, OHA (June 29, 1998).

(2) 2/ The Appellant is not appealing SR's March 26, 1998 determination with respect to its application of Exemption 6. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Appellant and Dawn Goldstein (June 16, 1998); Appeal Letter. Therefore, that issue will not be discussed in this Decision.

(3) 3/ In its Appeal, the Appellant argues that one of the cases SR relied upon in denying the fee waiver is inapposite. That case is American Airlines, Inc. v. National Mediation Board, 588 F.2d 863 (2d Cir. 1978). We find that SR correctly applied the principles of that case to the issue at hand in the instant case. It is true, as the Appellant points out, that the basic issue in the earlier case concerned whether the number of authorization cards submitted by a union constituted "commercial information." Id. at 870. However, in order to reach that decision, the Second Circuit necessarily had to decide whether unions engage in commercial activity, precisely the issue at stake in the instant case.

(4) 4/ We note that the Appellant originally requested that a breakdown of the fees be sent to it with its final bill. Since this was not done with the determination, this Office requested that SR send this breakdown to the Appellant and it has done so.

(5) 5/ In this regard, SR should consider whether the agency exercises the requisite amount of legal control over the copyrighted videos sufficient to render them agency records. See, e.g., Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 144-46.

(6) 6/ In its Appeal, the Appellant made an argument regarding the applicability of the attorney- client privilege to these documents. Since SR has not yet made a determination regarding these documents' releasability, the Appellant's argument is premature and we will not consider it at this time.

(7) 7/ SR has informed us that on May 18, 1998, a new ownership of records clause went into effect between WSI and DOE, known as Modification No. 35. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Timothy Fischer, Pauline Conner and Dawn Goldstein (June 28, 1998). It is our initial view that the ownership of records clause in effect at the time of the request at issue, Modification No. 11, should govern this Appeal, as well as SR's determination on remand.

(8)We note that any records indicating WSI's reimbursement of individual employees should be considered personnel records that WSI owns under its contract with the agency. These records include payroll records, time cards, and potentially vouchers, travel expenses and receipts. Such records are not subject to mandatory release. However, other types of responsive records might not be WSI-owned. These other types of records might include financial records showing outlays by WSI not related to specific personnel. Such records are owned by DOE and therefore subject to release under the contractor records regulation.

(9)With regard to these documents, SR correctly informed the Appellant of these documents' existence and that they had already been released to the Appellant. However, we note that SR is still obligated to provide another copy of these documents to the Appellant, if it so requests.

(10) 10/ We further note that this document does not appear to qualify as attorney work-product. It was not prepared by an attorney, nor was Mr. Weber acting as an agent for an attorney.

(11) 11/ DOE regulations set forth four additional criteria to be considered in determining whether information is exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 4: (i) whether the information has been held in confidence by the person to whom it pertains; (ii) whether the information is of a type customarily held in confidence by the person to whom it pertains and whether there is a reasonable basis therefor; (iii) whether the information was transmitted to and received by the DOE in confidence; and (iv) whether the information is available in public sources. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.11(f).

(12) 12/ We note that because SR is relying on the government impairment prong of Critical Mass, it was not required to obtain the submitter's views as to the application of Exemption 4 to the invoices.

(13) 13/ SR argued that the dates of these travel bills may reveal something about WSI's litigation strategy. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Timothy Fischer and Dawn Goldstein (June 22, 1998). While that is a sufficient justification for withholding the dates shown on the hotel bill and the travel expense form, it does not justify withholding these two documents in their entirety, as SR did in this case. SR also mentioned that it withheld the name of the hotel listed on the bill in the interest of privacy. Id. However, this justification was not mentioned in its determination letter. Nor does that reason provide a justification for withholding the entire bill. Thus, nothing on the travel bills and expense forms, with the possible exception of the date and the identity of the person traveling, appears to be properly withholdable.

(14) 14/ Two of the partners who worked on this case charged the same rate for litigation. Response Document 95. Therefore, to protect the identities of these two partners, their initials, for the items noting litigation charges, must continue to be withheld.

(15) 15/ We note that in contrast to Exemption 4, this public interest analysis does apply to documents withheld under Exemption 5. However, because we have not upheld SR's sole Exemption 5 determination, a public interest analysis is not required with respect to that document.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Karen Coleman Wiltshire

Date of Filing: June 5, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0422

On June 5, 1998, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received a submission from Karen Coleman Wiltshire which completes the filing of her Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) Appeal. Ms. Wiltshire appeals from a determination that the Acting Director of the Department of Energy's FOIA/Privacy Act Division issued to her on April 11, 1998. The Acting Director issued this determination in response to a request for information that Ms. Wiltshire submitted in accordance with the provisions of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the Acting Director to conduct a further search for responsive materials.

I. Background

In her request, Ms. Wiltshire sought access to information concerning (i) J.R. Brady, Deputy Director of Neuropsychiatry of the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research, (2) James Brennan, Armed Forces Radiobiology Research Institute, and (3) a specified study concerning thyroidal radioactive uptake evaluated by Bio- Science Labs of California. The Acting Director forwarded the request to the Office of Records, Research, Data and Access (ORRDA) of the Office of Environment, Safety and Health, which searched its files for responsive documents. The Acting Director informed Ms. Wiltshire that no such documents were located, and suggested that Ms. Wiltshire contact the Department of Defense (DOD) for assistance with her request.

In her Appeal, Ms. Wiltshire contests the adequacy of the search for responsive documents. Specifically, she states that she obtained her references to Messrs. Brady and Brennan and to radioiodine uptake studies through the Human Radiation Experiments Information Management System (HREX), an Internet-accessible database containing documents pertaining to experimental human radiation exposure. (1) She claims that HREX is a DOE database, and that therefore the DOE should be in possession of documents that are responsive to her request.

II. Analysis

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

In order to evaluate the adequacy of the search, we contacted ORRDA. This Office maintains the records of the DOE's Office of Human Radiation Experiments (OHRE). We were informed that all OHRE documents are available to the public through HREX, which was searched for documents responsive to Ms. Wiltshire's request. See memorandum of June 19, 1998 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Cindy Shinbledecker, ORRDA. Some of the documents found contain references to Messrs. Brady and Brennan and to thyroidal radioiodine uptake research.

This does not, however, necessarily imply the existence of further records of this type in the DOE's possession. The HREX database, which was designed and is maintained by Argonne National Laboratories, a DOE contractor, consists of documents that were obtained from the DOE, the DOD and various other federal agencies. The documents containing the references noted in Ms. Wiltshire's request are DOD records, not DOE records, and they are not in the DOE's custody. Id.; see also April 8, 1998 memorandum from Paul J. Seligman, Deputy Assistant Secretary for Health Studies, to the Acting Director. There is no evidence that DOE documents that are responsive to Ms. Wiltshire's request exist, or that there are other such records from other agencies that are in the DOE's possession. On the basis of the information before us, we conclude that the ORRDA's search for responsive documents was reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents, and was therefore adequate. Accordingly, we will deny Ms. Wiltshire's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Karen Coleman Wiltshire on June 5, 1998 is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0423, 27 DOE ¶ 80,150

July 28, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Edwin S. Rothschild

Date of Filing: July 1, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0423

Edwin S. Rothschild files this Appeal under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (the Department) at 10 C.F.R. § 1004. The subject of the Appeal is a determination letter that the Department's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Strategic Petroleum Reserves (the Denying Official) issued in response to Rothschild's request for records pursuant to the FOIA. As explained below, we will deny the Appeal.

The origin of this Appeal lies in a request that Rothschild filed on July 7, 1997. In the request, Rothschild sought:

all records --draft reports, memoranda, analysis, meeting minutes, briefing documents, e-mail messages, etc. pertaining to a report to Congress on the costs and benefits of a regional petroleum product reserve, as well as all records pertaining to consideration of a regional petroleum product reserve with regard to the Department of Energy's Policy Statement of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve.

The Department released various documents, and withheld a number on the ground that they were "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party ... in litigation with the agency," provided in the FOIA at 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5) (Exemption 5). The Denying Official stated that the requested documents came within two categories of material protected from disclosure by Exemption 5: documents produced during a "deliberative process," and documents protected by the attorney-client privilege.(1)

Rothschild appealed the determination to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. In his appeal to the court, Rothschild conceded that the responsive documents were predecisional and deliberative. He argued, however, that the Department's search for responsive documents was inadequate, and that the Department waived the deliberative process privilege by authorizing a meeting between a Departmental subcontractor who was preparing the report and a representative of the petroleum industry. The court granted summary judgment to the Department, upholding the Department's decision to withhold the documents. Rothschild v. Department of Energy, Civil Action No. 97-1825 (May 1, 1998).

The Department issued a report to Congress regarding the proposed regional petroleum product reserve on May 13, 1998.(2) Rothschild then filed a second FOIA request for the the same documents. The request was denied in a determination letter dated June 29, 1998. In response to this determination letter, Rothschild filed the present appeal, arguing that the publication of the report "mandates the release of the responsive requested documents." Appeal at 2.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. There are, however, nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release.

Exemption 5, which is at issue in this appeal, exempts a broad range of material, encompassing both statutory privileges and privileges recognized by case law. United States v. Weber Aircraft Corp., 443 U.S. 340, 354 (1979). Among the privileges that fall under this exclusion is the "executive" or "deliberative process" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). The deliberative process privilege permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132 at 150 (1975) (Sears).

The purpose of Exemption 5 is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink). To qualify for protection under the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5, a document must be both predecisional (i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy), and deliberative (i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process). Coastal States at 866.

In his effort to overcome Exemption 5 protection for the documents he seeks, Rothschild raises two arguments on appeal. In the first argument, Rothschild claims that "the information I requested was denied based on its ?predecisional character.' However, in May of this year the Department of Energy issued the ?United States Statement of Policy on the Strategic Petroleum Reserve," ... This determination constitutes an official agency position, which in turn mandates the release of the responsive requested documents." Appeal at 2.

Rothschild's claim is based on a misunderstanding of the law. The predecisional nature of documents is not changed by the fact that the agency has subsequently made a final decision. Federal Open Mkt. Comm. v. Merrill, 443 U.S. 340, 360 (1979) (Merrill); May v. Department of the Air Force, 777 F.2d 1012, 1014-15 (5th Cir. 1985); Cuccaro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 357 (3rd Cir. 1985). As the Court explained in Merrill:

the purpose of the privilege for predecisional deliberations is to insure that a decision maker will receive the unimpeded advice of his associates. The theory is that if advice is revealed, associates may be reluctant to be candid and frank. It follows that documents shielded by executive privilege remain privileged even after the decision to which they pertain may have been effected, since disclosure at any time could inhibit the free flow of advice, including analysis, reports, and expression of opinion within the agency.

Merrill, 443 U.S. 359-60.

Rothschild's second argument is essentially a policy argument. He contends that the responsive documents:

which form the basis for the Department's ... final policy directive submitted to Congress, constitute the ? working law' of the agency and should be held outside the protection of Exemption 5. Agencies cannot use the deliberative privilege to create a body of secret law by which they justify their decisions and actions.

Appeal at 2, citing Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 868.

Rothschild is correct in asserting that Exemption 5 cannot be used to shield documents that comprise the "secret law" of an agency. This argument, however, is inapplicable to the documents at issue in this case. Courts have defined "secret law" as "orders and interpretations which [the agency] actually applies to cases before it." Sterling Drug, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F.2d 698, 708 (D.C. Cir. 1971). Consequently, such documents are not truly predecisional, but "discuss established policies and decision." Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 868 (emphasis in the original).

We examined the documents withheld by the Department in this case. They consist of drafts of the final report, and memoranda and e- mail messages suggesting alternative ways of analyzing the data. There is no indication that these documents were applied to deciding cases, or to any use other than the preparation of the final report. On the contrary, we believe that providing protection for these documents is squarely in accord with the policy goals of Exemption 5: (1) to encourage frank, open, discussions on matters of policy between subordinates and superiors; and (2) to protect against public confusion that might result from disclosure of reasons and rationales that were not in fact ultimately the grounds for an agency's action. Jordan v. Dep't of Justice, 591 F.2d 753, 772-3.

As a final consideration, the Department's regulations provide that it shall release material to the public if it is determined that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest to do so, even if the material is exempt from release under the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that the Denying Official properly applied Exemption 5 to most of the requested documents, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless requires disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. See Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993), stating that the Department of Justice will defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption.

In the present case, the Denying Official stated that:

Discretionary release of these documents is not in the public interest. The quality of agency decisions would be adversely affected if frank, written discussion of policy matters were inhibited by the knowledge that the content of such discussion might be made public... Furthermore, the documents do not reflect the final agency view on the subjects they discuss and it would therefore mislead the public if the documents were to be released."

After reviewing the documents, we agree with the analysis of the Denying Official. We find instead the documents to consist of "advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of a process by which governmental decisions and policies are formulated," which Exemption 5 was designed to protect. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. See Eva Glow Brownlow, 27 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1998).

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the Denying Official correctly determined that the responsive documents are exempt from mandatory disclosure pursuant to Exemption 5, and that release of the documents would not be in the public interest. We will therefore deny the appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Edwin S. Rothschild, Case Number VFA-0423, is hereby denied.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0424, 27 DOE ¶ 80,151

July 31, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Charles W. Hemingway

Date of Filing:July 2, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0424

On July 2, 1998, Charles W. Hemingway appealed a determination that the Office of the General Counsel (OGC) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued on June 30, 1998, under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In this Appeal, Mr. Hemingway requests that the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) order OGC to release information withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA. For the reasons detailed below, we will deny this Appeal.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. §1004.10(b). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

BACKGROUND

This Appeal arises from Mr. Hemingway’s request for copies of the financial disclosure reports (Forms SF 278), including attachments, filed by Corlis M. Moody, a DOE official. In addition to Ms. Moody’s Forms SF 278, Mr. Hemingway requested copies of documents, including opinions or statements rendered by agency ethics counsel, as well as correspondence between agency personnel and Ms. Moody, concerning the financial disclosure reports.

On June 30, 1998, Ralph Goldenberg, the Assistant General Counsel for General Law, responded to Mr. Hemingway's request for documents by issuing a determination under the FOIA. The requested documents were attached to the determination. Mr. Goldenberg also indicated that, pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6), Ms. Moody's home address, personal brokerage account number, and social security number had been redacted from one of the documents. Mr. Goldenberg indicated that this information had been withheld because:

[d]isclosure of the withheld information would constitute an invasion of the personal privacy of the individual because it could lead to unwanted communications and attention that would be intrusions into her personal life. Moreover, disclosure of this information will not reveal any aspect about the operations or activities of the Government.

On July 2, 1998, Mr. Hemingway filed this Appeal.

ANALYSIS

In his Appeal, Mr. Hemingway contends that the redacted information was wrongfully withheld under Exemption 6 of the FOIA because he made his request for disclosure under the Ethics in Government Act (EGA), 5 U.S.C. App. 4 §§ 101 et seq., and the FOIA exemptions are inapplicable to disclosures required by the EGA.(1) Mr. Hemingway also claims that DOE waived the right to withhold Ms. Moody's social security number under Exemption 6 because DOE had previously released this information in response to an appeal before the Merit Systems Protection Board (MSPB).(2) For the reasons detailed below, we find that Mr. Hemingway's arguments are unpersuasive.

THE SCOPE OF OHA'S JURISDICTION

OHA lacks jurisdiction to determine issues that arise under the EGA. OHA has held that jurisdictional regulations must be explicit and narrowly construed. See Suffolk County, 17 DOE ¶ 80,111 at 80,524 (1988) (dismissing FOIA appeal because OHA lacks jurisdiction of matters not explicitly set forth in jurisdictional regulation); John H. Hnatio, 13 DOE ¶ 80,119 at 80,566 (1985) (dismissing FOIA appeal based on narrow construction of jurisdictional regulation); Tulsa Tribune, 11 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,741 (1984) (without explicit statutory or regulatory provision, no administrative remedy for agency's non-compliance with a timeliness requirement).

Neither Congress nor any administrative agency has empowered OHA to adjudicate matters arising under the EGA. Thus, in the absence of an explicit grant of authority, OHA lacks jurisdiction to adjudicate such disputes. Accordingly, we dismiss that portion of Mr. Hemingway's appeal that is based on DOE's failure to release information under the EGA.

EXEMPTION 6 OF THE FOIA

We also find that the Ms. Moody's social security number, personal brokerage account number, and home address were properly redacted under Exemption 6 of the FOIA. Exemption 6 permits an agency to make a discretionary withholding of information that must otherwise be released in response to a FOIA request if the materials are "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). After ensuring that the documents meet the threshold test for types of material covered by Exemption 6, an agency must balance the public interest in disclosure with the privacy interest involved. Department of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 164, 175 (1991); Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749, 762 (1989) (Reporters Committee); Department of the Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 372 (1976) (Rose); Harold H. Johnson, 21 DOE ¶ 80,148 at 80,640 (1991).

First, we believe that the document containing the redacted information meets the Exemption 6 threshold test as of being within the category of "personnel and medical files and similar files." The Supreme Court has taken an expansive view of what falls within this phrase. The Court has made clear that Exemption 6 extends to "detailed Government records on an individual that can be identified as applying to that individual." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 602 (1982) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 89-1497, at 11 (1966), reprinted in 1966 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2418, 2428). Here, the document at issue is a detailed government record that can be identified as applying to a named DOE official. This easily falls within the Supreme Court's Exemption 6 threshold definition. See Rose, 425 U.S. at 376-80.

In applying the balancing portion of the Exemption 6 test, we must examine the types of information redacted, identify any privacy interest involved, and weigh that against any public interest in the material as defined by the Supreme Court. We first find that Ms. Moody has a privacy interest in her social security number, personal brokerage account number, and home address. See Department of Defense v. Federal Labor Relations Auth., 510 U.S. 487, 497-501 (1994) (home addresses); Barvick v. Cisneros, 941 F. Supp. 1015 (D. Kan. 1996) (home addresses and telephone numbers, dates of birth, maiden names, life insurance and annuity information); Oliva v. HUD, 756 F. Supp. 105 (E.D.N.Y. 1991) (social security numbers).

As noted above, once we identify a privacy interest, we must then determine whether there is a FOIA-defined public interest in release of the withheld material. In Reporters Committee, the Court took an exceptionally narrow view of what is in the public interest for the purposes of the FOIA. The only relevant public interest, in the Court's view, is the extent to which release of information would contribute "'significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government.'" Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 775 (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii)). Here, release of the redacted information would not in any way "shed light on the conduct of any Government agency or official," Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 773, or the public's understanding of what the government has done and is doing. Ms. Moody's social security number, personal account number, and home address do not provide any information that may be used to determine the propriety of her official conduct. Because OGC released the entire substance of the requested documents, we find that no further benefit would accrue to the public interest, under the Supreme Court's definition, by release of the redacted information. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 766 n.18.

The Exemption 6 balancing test presupposes that there is some public interest to balance. Thus, where there is no public interest to balance, as here, the privacy interest in non-disclosure, however small, must prevail. Maynard v. Central Intelligence Agency, 986 F.2d 547, 566 n.21 (1st Cir. 1993); Federal Labor Relations Auth. v. Department of Defense, 984 F.2d 370, 374 (10th Cir. 1993). Accordingly, we find that Ms. Moody's privacy interest in the redacted information outweighs the lack of a FOIA-defined public interest, and that this information was properly withheld from disclosure.

The Appellant contends that DOE waived its right to claim that Ms. Moody's social security number may be withheld from disclosure under Exemption 6 because it released this information in response to an appeal filed with the MSPB. The Supreme Court rejected a similar argument in Reporters Committee, when it held that individuals have a privacy interest in the non-disclosure of their arrest and conviction records ("rap-sheets"), although most of the rap-sheet information is a matter of public record. The Court based this conclusion on the "practical obscurity" of the arrest and conviction information that is available to the public. 489 U.S. at 762, 764, 780. Similarly, because of the "practical obscurity" of the information contained in the MSPB files no waiver of privacy interest occurred, and Ms. Moody continues to have a privacy interest in the non-disclosure of her social security number. See also Federal Labor Relations Auth., 510 U.S. at 500 (privacy interest in non- release of information does not dissolve because the information may be available in another form to the public); L & C Marine Transp. Ltd. v. United States, 740 F.2d 919, 922 (11th Cir. 1984) (privacy interest not lost because information may be discovered through other means); Tenaska Washington Partners II, L.P., 25 DOE ¶ 80,212 (1996) (inadvertent release of personal information by federal agency does not destroy privacy rights).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The portion of the Appeal filed by Charles W. Hemingway on July 2, 1998, that is based on DOE's failure to release information under the Ethics in Government Act is hereby dismissed, and the remainder of the Appeal is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The EGA requires that financial disclosure reports (Forms SF 278) submitted by certain high- level government officials be released to the public. 5 U.S.C. App. 4 § 105. See also 5 C.F.R. § 2634.603. Gregg Burgess, an OGC staff attorney, told us that the redacted document was not part of a SF 278, but was submitted by Ms. Moody as proof that she had sold certain stock. He stated that this document was released under the FOIA because OGC concluded that this document did not have to be disclosed under the EGA.

(2)Additionally, Mr. Hemingway alleges that DOE improperly redacted information from Ms. Moody's 1997 Form SF 278 without explanation. See Mead Data Central v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977) (FOIA requires the agency to provide a reasonably specific justification for withholding documents or portions of documents). However, after investigation, we find that OGC did not improperly redact information from this document. Gregg Burgess, the OGC staff attorney, informed us that he redacted the information at issue on July 23, 1997, when he was conducting a substantive review of Ms. Moody's Form SF 278 to determine compliance with the EGA. In accordance with the general practice at OGC, the information was redacted because Ms. Moody was not required to report it on the Form SF 278. Accordingly, we conclude that OGC redacted this information in the ordinary course of business, and that OGC did not have an unredacted copy of this document when it received Mr. Hemingway's request for documents.

Case No. VFA-0426, 27 DOE ¶ 80,153

August 11, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Arnold Kramish

Date of Filing: July 17, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0426

On July 17, 1998, Arnold Kramish filed an appeal from a June 24, 1998 determination by the Acting Director of the FOIA/Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat of the Department of Energy (DOE). In that determination, the Acting Director partially granted a request for information the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In his appeal, Mr. Kramish asks that we order a search for additional responsive documents.

I. Background

In his request for information, Mr. Kramish sought copies of all personnel records the DOE possesses concerning Robert and Charlotte Serber. In a June 24, 1998 letter, the Acting Director enclosed responsive information concerning Robert Serber. However, the Acting Director informed Mr. Kramish that he did not find any responsive information on Charlotte Serber.

In his appeal, Mr. Kramish states that several published books refer to the “Serber security records” from the August 5, 1948 Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) Personnel Security Board hearing in San Francisco involving Robert Serber. In addition, Mr. Kramish asserts that a July 12, 1948 Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) memorandum (a copy of which he enclosed in his appeal) confirms that the AEC possessed substantial security-related materials concerning Robert and Charlotte Serber. Mr. Kramish argues that it is improbable that security records and transcripts for this important case no longer exist. In his appeal, Mr. Kramish also requests a copy of the AEC information referenced in the July 12, 1948 FBI memorandum.

II. Analysis

Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the appeal, we contacted a representative of the Acting Director to ascertain the validity of Mr. Kramish's contention that there must exist additional responsive information. We supplied the Acting Director with the additional background information regarding the Serbers that Mr. Kramish provided in his appeal. The Acting Director used this material to conduct another search for responsive information in the Office of Nonproliferation and National Security and in the Office of the Executive Secretariat. The Acting Director confirmed that neither of these offices possess additional responsive information or a copy of the AEC information referenced in the July 12, 1948 FBI memorandum. We find that the Acting Director correctly searched all of the DOE offices that would likely have responsive information. Since neither of these two offices possess additional responsive information and we have no reason to believe that other DOE offices possess additional responsive information, we must deny Mr. Kramish's appeal.

During our investigation of this appeal, we discovered the possibility that responsive records may exist at the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA). Specifically, the representative of the Acting Director informed us that responsive information may exist in "Box SI-4-1, Investigation of Clearance, Vol. 2, dated December 16, 1954" at NARA. Since this box appears to be in the possession of NARA and was not in the control of the DOE at the time of Mr. Kramish's request, it is not a DOE record subject to a FOIA request at the DOE. See Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-45 (1989). However, Mr. Kramish is free to contact NARA directly to request copies of this information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The appeal filed by Arnold Kramish on July 17, 1998 is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Bernice McCulloh

Date of Filings: July 13, 1998

Case Numbers: VFA-0427

On July 13, 1998, Bernice McCulloh (McCulloh) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR) issued to her on June 23, 1998. The determination concerned a request for information that McCulloh submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, DOE/OR would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

According to McCulloh, in 1960 her mother was treated with radiation therapy(1) at Baptist Hospital in Winston Salem, North Carolina for cancer of the cervix. See Letter from McCulloh to Amy Rothrock, FOIA Officer, DOE/OR (June 10, 1998) (Request Letter); Clinical Summary, North Carolina Baptist Hospital (August 15, 1960). The treatment involved Cobalt-60 implants(2) allegedly prepared at DOE/OR for experimental purposes. McCulloh contends that her mother, Flossie Hilton (Hilton), was an unknowing participant in one such experiment, and was subjected to a very large dose of radiation that ultimately resulted in her death. See Request Letter. In 1994, McCulloh contacted the DOE's Office of Human Radiation Experimentation (OHRE)(3) and was assigned a case worker. Letter from McCulloh to DOE, EH Hotline (February 1, 1994). DOE found that Hilton was not a participant in an experiment, but rather, her therapy represented "conventional medical treatment . . . for that time." Letter from Tara O'Toole, Assistant Secretary, EH to McCulloh (September 8, 1995). See also Letter from Peter Brush, Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary, EH to McCulloh (November 22, 1995). In addition, DOE stated that neither DOE nor its predecessor agencies were associated with the type of experimentation that McCulloh described at Baptist Hospital. Id. A review of DOE records revealed that human radiation experiments involving other isotopes were conducted at Baptist Hospital, but none involved Cobalt-60. Letter from Director, OHRE, to McCulloh (September 27, 1995). McCulloh continued to correspond with OHRE and EH through 1997, and the agency maintained that her mother was not the subject of any DOE-conducted experiment. See Letter from Peter Brush, EH to McCulloh (November 7, 1997) (stating that exposure to ionizing radiation is not defined as an experiment).

Not satisfied with the responses from OHRE and EH, McCulloh submitted a FOIA request to DOE/OR for information about the Cobalt-60 treatment and her mother's experience. See Request Letter. On June 23, 1998, DOE/OR sent McCulloh copies of "the only two studies performed at Oak Ridge pertaining to Cobalt 60." Letter from Amy Rothrock, Authorizing Official, to McCulloh (June 23, 1998) (Determination Letter). Neither study involved treatment for cancer of the cervix. On July 13, 1998, McCulloh filed the present Appeal, challenging the adequacy of DOE/OR's search.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted DOE/OR to ascertain the scope of the search it performed for the responsive documents. According to the FOIA Officer, DOE/OR only retains information about patients who were treated at the now-defunct Oak Ridge Institute for Nuclear Studies (ORINS) Hospital in Oak Ridge. Because Hilton was treated at Baptist Hospital, the FOIA Officer stated that Baptist Hospital would be the most likely repository of information about where the isotope was purchased and the exact dosage used. Nonetheless, the FOIA Officer informed us that she and her staff searched at DOE/OR for documents containing any of the following subjects: (1) Hilton's name, (2) experiments with Cobalt-60, (3) the name of the doctor who allegedly prepared the isotope used in the treatment, and (4) Baptist Hospital in Winston Salem, North Carolina. The search produced two documents containing information about two Cobalt-60 experiments, both involving leukemia patients.

However, the DOE/OR FOIA Officer also noted that there may be statistical identifiers attached to the records of the two DOE Cobalt-60 experiments and, if Hilton was a subject, this information could confirm her participation. After discussing the Appeal with this office, the DOE/OR FOIA Officer offered to research the sponsoring office of the experiment for additional information on where the isotope was prepared and where the experiments took place. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock, Authorizing Official, DOE/OR and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (July 30, 1998).

We find that DOE/OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover all documents related to Hilton's Cobalt-60 treatment at Baptist Hospital in 1960. After determining that McCulloh had corresponded with OHRE and received some responsive material from that office, DOE/OR then searched for and found additional responsive documents. Even though the experiments in the documents did not seem, on their face, related to Hilton's treatment, DOE/OR nonetheless has agreed to research the experiments further to ascertain any reference to Hilton. A new response is forthcoming. As stated above, the FOIA does not require an exhaustive search, only a reasonable one. On the basis of the facts provided above, we find that DOE/OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents. Accordingly, we must deny McCulloh's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on July 13, 1998 by Bernice McCulloh, OHA Case No. VFA-0427, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)Radiation therapy is the treatment of cancer and other diseases with ionizing radiation. Ionizing radiation deposits energy that injures or destroys cells in the area being treated and makes it impossible for these cells to continue to grow. It is often used to treat localized solid tumors, such as cancer of the skin, breast, or cervix. National Cancer Institute Website.

(2)Cobalt-60 is a radioisotope (an atom with nuclei that are seeking a more stable nuclear configuration by emitting radiation). Radioisotopes can be manipulated to perform different tasks, and are widely used in medicine and in many industrial processes. The documents concern experiments conducted at government and non- government facilities. DECISION AND ORDER

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Gary A. Davis

Date of Filing: July 21, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0429

On July 21, 1998, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) Appeal filed by Gary A. Davis. Davis is appealing a determination by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge). Oak Ridge issued a determination on June 25, 1998, in response to a request for information submitted in accordance with the provisions of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require Oak Ridge to conduct a further search for responsive materials.

I. Background

The request sought access to documents containing information about the following four items:

(1) The Anderson County [Tennessee] Landfill . . . and any of its operations;

(2) Any waste materials disposed of by DOE, its predecessors and its contractors in the Anderson County Landfill;

(3) Any waste materials transferred off the Oak Ridge Reservation by local or regional waste management companies or contractors, which may have been disposed of in the Anderson County Landfill; and

(4) The disposal of waste materials by American Nuclear Corporation in Anderson County, Tennessee.

On June 25, 1998, Oak Ridge issued a determination letter in which it claimed that it was unable to locate any documents responsive to the first item of Davis' request. As for the other three requested items, Oak Ridge distinguished between hazardous and sanitary wastes. Oak Ridge alleged that since it has no way of determining which landfill its sanitary waste disposal contractors use, it could not locate any responsive documents involving sanitary wastes. Oak Ridge further claims that hundreds of thousands of hazardous waste manifests would have to be searched individually in order to determine whether hazardous wastes from Oak Ridge would have been disposed of in the Anderson County Landfill. (1) The determination letter further informed Davis that he could call or write Oak Ridge to clarify or narrow the scope of the search for hazardous waste manifests.

In his Appeal, Davis does not contest Oak Ridge's determination that it could not locate any documents responsive to Item 1 of his request. However, Davis contests the adequacy of the search for documents which are responsive to the remaining three items. Specifically, he contends that:

1) Oak Ridge should have searched the procurement files for Oak Ridge's waste contractors during the relevant time period, since it is not uncommon for contracts with disposal contractors to specify a disposal site;

2) It is unnecessary to search every hazardous waste manifest. Since there were state requirements that required preapproval before certain hazardous wastes, those records could be searched instead; and

3) Oak Ridge did not indicate the results of its search for documents responsive to Item 4.

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of the Search

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

We find that Oak Ridge's response to Items 2 and 3 was inadequate. Oak Ridge claims that the search for responsive documents would involve hundreds of thousands of hazardous waste manifests, and would not likely result identifying responsive documents because most of DOE's hazardous wastes were shipped out of state. Oak Ridge's determination letter then suggests that Davis could contact Oak Ridge in order to narrow the scope of its request.

The DOE's FOIA regulations state that "a request must enable the DOE to identify and locate the records sought by a process that is not unreasonably burdensome or disruptive of DOE operations." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(c)(1). However, the search for responsive documents would not necessarily include the search of hundreds of thousands of documents as Oak Ridge asserts. Instead, we agree with Davis that Oak Ridge could have searched the contracts of all of its hazardous waste contractors during the period set forth in the request (1971 through 1982). Such a search would have satisfied DOE's obligations under the FOIA without placing an undue burden upon Oak Ridge's operations. Accordingly, we are remanding this portion of the Appeal to Oak Ridge. On remand, Oak Ridge should search the contracts of each hazardous waste contractor for the years 1971 through 1982 for the identity of specified and/or preapproved disposal sites.

B. Adequacy of the Determination

After conducting a search for responsive documents under the FOIA, the statute requires that the agency provide the requester with a written determination notifying the requester of the results of that search and, if applicable, of the agency's intentions to withhold any of the responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). In doing so, the determination letter allows the requester to decide whether the agency's response to its request was adequate and proper and provides this office with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal.

After reviewing the record, we find that the determination letter that Oak Ridge issued to Davis fails to respond to Item 4 of the request. Accordingly, Item 4 is to be remanded to Oak Ridge. On remand, Oak Ridge must conduct a thorough search for responsive documents and issue a new determination letter. The new determination letter should contain a thorough description of the scope of the search conducted in response to this item of the request.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Gary A. Davis on July 21, 1998, case number VFA-0429, is hereby granted and remanded to the Oak Ridge Operations Office which shall promptly implement the instructions set forth above.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0430, 27 DOE ¶ 80,157

August 20, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell

Date of Filing:July 23, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0430

On July 23, 1998, the Washington, D.C., law firm of Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell (Baker, Donelson) filed an Appeal from a determination issued on June 29, 1998, by the Golden Field Office of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied in part the law firm's request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

The FOIA requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the Federal Government, and which have not been made public in an authorized manner, generally be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). In addition to this requirement, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure will nonetheless be released to the public if the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. See also Dykema Gossett, PLLC, 26 DOE ¶ 80,237 at 80,904-05 (1997) (no public interest analysis required in Exemption 4 cases because release of exempt material would violate the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905).

BACKGROUND

On June 9, 1998, Baker, Donelson filed a FOIA request with the Freedom of Information Officer at DOE Headquarters in Washington, D.C. The request sought any document provided to the DOE by the National Renewable Energy Laboratory (NREL), or any contractor, concerning the DOE "Building America" program. The June 9 request also referenced a previous April 28, 1998 FOIA request to DOE Headquarters looking for other documents related to the "Building America" program and contracts issued pursuant to Request for Proposal RAR-4-14061. DOE Headquarters referred the request to the Golden Field Office, the portion of the Department that was determined to have responsive documents. In its June 29, 1998 determination, the Golden Field Office released all responsive information in its files except records concerning a contract between NREL and Steven Winter Associates, Inc. This material was withheld pursuant to Exemption 4, which permits withholding of confidential business and trade secret information. Baker, Donelson appeals this withholding.

ANALYSIS

Exemption 4 permits an agency to withhold from release to a FOIA requester "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). Thus, to qualify for this exemption, withheld material must either be (A) information that constitutes a trade secret or (B) information that is (1) "commercial" or "financial," (2) "obtained from a person," and (3) "privileged" or "confidential." In applying Exemption 4, the withholding office must first determine whether the information either is a trade secret or is commercial or financial information. If the agency determines the material is trade secret information for the purposes of the FOIA, its analysis is complete and the material may be withheld under Exemption 4. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. Food & Drug Admin., 704 F.2d 1280, 1286, 1288 (D.C. Cir. 1983). However, if the agency determines the material is commercial or financial information, there is another threshold determination the agency must make: whether the information was involuntarily or voluntarily submitted. If it was involuntarily submitted, the information may be withheld under Exemption 4 if disclosure is likely either to (A) impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (B) cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. National Parks and Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765, 770 (D.C. Cir. 1974). Conversely, if the information is voluntarily submitted, it may be withheld under Exemption 4 if it is of a kind that the submitter would not customarily make available to the public. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Comm'n, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992). As the descriptions indicate, these three tests are mutually exclusive; for Exemption 4 purposes information is either voluntarily or involuntarily submitted commercial or financial information or it is a trade secret.

In its determination letter, the Golden Field Office offered three justifications for invoking Exemption 4. First, it stated that, "[a]ccording to the submitter, such information would not customarily be disclosed to the public." Thus, the Determination Letter implied that the relevant information was commercial or financial material that was voluntarily submitted, and that it was withheld on that basis under the Critical Mass standard. However, the Determination Letter then stated that the withheld information "could cause substantial harm to their [the submitter's] competitive position, in that it could allow competing institutions to determine their trade secrets." This indicates that the material was trade secret information. Finally, the Determination Letter added that "[d]isclosure could also have a chilling effect on the government's ability to work with similar institutions in the future." With this statement, the Determination Letter reverted to a finding that the material was commercial or financial information. However, under this formulation, the Determination Letter applied the National Parks test for involuntarily submitted information as opposed to the Critical Mass standard for voluntarily submitted information that it previously employed.

When the Determination Letter melded together the three, analytically distinct, Exemption 4 tests, it became unclear which test applied, or whether discrete portions of the information individually qualified for the different tests. As a result, the Determination Letter does not satisfy either the FOIA or the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. Both require a reasonably specific justification for withholding a document. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6), 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1); Digital City Communications, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,657 (1997). This allows both the requester and this Office to determine whether the claimed exemption was accurately applied. Tri-State Drilling, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,202 at 80,816 (1997). It also aids the requester in formulating a meaningful appeal and this Office in reviewing that appeal. Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, 22 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,517 (1992). The Determination Letter does not conform to these principles because it fails to precisely state or explain the application of Exemption 4. As such, it does not permit either a meaningful appeal or review.

Under these circumstances, the proper course is to remand this matter to the Golden Field Office to issue a new determination. That determination shall either release the withheld information or provide a new justification for withholding. If the Golden Field Office chooses the latter course, it must explain which Exemption 4 test it is applying to the material it withholds, and it must provide more than the simple restatement of the applicable Exemption 4 test. William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,221 at 80,861 (1997); Davis Wright & Jones, 19 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,510 (1989). Finally, if the Golden Field Office withholds any information, it should segregate and release any non-exempt material. 5 U.S.C. § 552(c); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b); Glen M. Jameson, 26 DOE ¶ 80,236 at 80,902 (1997)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell of Washington, D.C. on July 23, 1998, OHA Case No. VFA-0430, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Golden Field Office to issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Hanford Education Action League

Date of Filing: July 24, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0431

On July 24, 1998, the Hanford Education Action League (HEAL) filed an Appeal from a determination issued on June 22, 1998, by the Department of Energy's Richland Operations Office (DOE/RL). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appellant challenges the adequacy of DOE/RL's search for documents responsive to its request.

I. Background

On June 23, 1992, the Appellant requested from the DOE a number of specific documents "relating to the operations of the Department of Energy's Hanford facility near Richland, Washington." In Item 2 of the request, HEAL sought copies of "[a]ll volumes of the ?Manager's Data Book,' 1944-1954." Letter from James P. Thomas, Research Director, HEAL to Yvonne Sherman, FOI Officer, DOE/RL (June 23, 1992). DOE/RL issued a determination on June 22, 1998, by which it released documents responsive to Item 2 of HEAL's request. Letter from Karen K. Randolph, Director, Office of External Affairs, DOE/RL, to James P. Thomas (June 22, 1998). On July 24, 1998, HEAL filed the present appeal stating that the DOE "did not provide all responsive records. . . . The Department should conduct a more extensive search for responsive records. . . . [T]he Department should also provide a listing of all document repositories searched as well as documentation for any records that have been destroyed." Appeal at 1.

II. Analysis

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

Accordingly, after receiving HEAL's Appeal, we contacted DOE/RL to find out about the search it conducted in response to HEAL's request. DOE/RL informed us that it was able to locate documents responsive to Item 2 of HEAL's request (for Manager's Data Books, 1944-1954) through two sources. The first source is a Records Inventory and Disposition Schedule (RIDS). By consulting RIDS, DOE/RL can determine whether documents have been disposed of, and if not, where the documents would be located. In this instance, the RIDS schedule identified, by document number, specific records that were responsive to Item 2 of HEAL's request. The schedule indicated that the documents had not been destroyed and would be located in boxes numbered 1063 and 1064 in DOE/RL's records holding area. The second source of information on the location of responsive documents was a database called DDTS (Declassified Document Tracking System), which tracks Richland's classified and previously classified documents. Queries of this database can be done by document number, title, authors' last name, and certain keywords. Personnel in the records holding area performed a query of the database, the results of which referred to the same specific documents listed on the RIDS schedule, and indicated that they would be located in the same boxes numbered 1063 and 1064. DOE/RL found the documents that the RIDS schedule and DDTS query results identified, Manager's Data Books dated from 1949 forward, in these boxes. With the exception of two documents discussed below, DOE/RL eventually released these documents to the Appellant. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Dorothy Riehle, Office of External Affairs, DOE/RL, and Steve Goering, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (August 3, 1998).

In its Appeal, HEAL stated that DOE "did not provide at least two responsive documents: (1) HAN-25408 ½ (volumes 1, 2, and 3) and (2) the Manager's Data Book for 1950." DOE/RL has informed us that these two documents were among those specifically identified as responsive in its search described above, which was conducted shortly after HEAL's request was received in 1992, and that shortly thereafter these documents were sent to a DOE/RL classification officer for review. However, these two documents did not make their way through the lengthy process of review for classified information, and therefore were not among those that DOE/RL released in its June 22, 1998 determination. DOE/RL states, and we have no reason to doubt, that it believed at the time that it was releasing all identified responsive documents in its determination. After we received the present Appeal, with its reference to these two documents, and forwarded a copy of the Appeal to DOE/RL, records holding personnel at DOE/RL located the two documents in the same boxes where they had originally been found. These documents are now being reviewed and will be released to the Appellant with, if necessary, exempt information withheld.

HEAL also contends in its Appeal that, although the documents Richland released generally include one book for each year of the relevant period, "there may have been two data books per year. Among the documents received thus far, there are two versions of the 1951 Construction Data Book (June and November) as well as two data books for 1952 (June and December)." Appeal at 1. The Appellant states that,

[a]fter more detailed analysis of the publicly available data books, I am beginning to understand why there were likely two data books for each year. I think that the Manager's Data Books were Richland's official submittal to headquarters for the purpose of headquarters compiling the mandated AEC semi-annual reports to Congress.

Therefore, it is reasonable to conclude that there would be additional copies of Hanford's data books at headquarters.

Electronic mail from Jim Thomas, HEAL, to Steven Goering, OHA (August 4, 1998).

First, regarding the two responsive documents that DOE/RL did not provide to the appellant, we do not find that the apparently inadvertent failure of DOE/RL to release these two documents reflects negatively on DOE/RL's search. The two documents were, in fact, specifically identified as responsive in that search, but for reasons unrelated to the search were not released to HEAL on June 22, 1998. Second, while the Appellant may be correct that there were Manager's Data Books created that were not among those located in the search at DOE/RL, this possibility alone does not undermine the adequacy of DOE/RL's search. As we stated above, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982). The point the Appellant raises does, however, suggest that there may be additional responsive documents at DOE Headquarters. We will therefore remand this matter to the Freedom of Information and Privacy Group at DOE Headquarters (FOI and Privacy Group) for a search for responsive documents in headquarters offices.

Based on our review of the particulars of DOE/RL's search as set forth above, we find that DOE/RL took steps reasonably calculated to uncover the documents sought by the Appellant. DOE/RL personnel consulted presumably reliable sources to determine where responsive documents would be, and these sources led DOE/RL to a location where it found those documents. There is no information of which we are aware that would point to other locations at DOE/RL where additional responsive documents might exist,(1) and the FOIA clearly does not require DOE/RL to conduct an exhaustive search through all of its document holdings to make certain that it has no other documents responsive to the Appellant's request. We therefore find that DOE/RL's search was adequate to meet the requirements of the FOIA. In this respect, the present Appeal will be denied, but we will grant the Appeal to the extent that we are remanding the matters to the FOI and Privacy Group for a search of DOE Headquarters offices.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by the Hanford Education Action League, Case Number VFA-0431, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the DOE's FOI and Privacy Group, which shall conduct a search of DOE Headquarters offices for documents responsive to Item 2 of the Appellant's June 23, 1992 request, and release to the Appellant any responsive documents, or explain in detail its reasons for withholding responsive documents with reference to one or more FOIA exemptions.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1) In considering the present Appeal, we discussed with the Appellant the possibility that DOE/RL's search should have included a specific search of the Counsel's Office at DOE/RL, because the documents at issue relate to matters currently in litigation. We have discussed this with DOE/RL, and we are convinced that a specific search of the DOE/RL's Counsel's Office is not required before we can deem the search adequate under the FOIA. First, DOE/RL pointed out to us that HEAL's 1992 request, and the search that was conducted shortly thereafter, predates the litigation in question. Further, even if the Counsel's Office had responsive documents in its possession at that time, those documents would have been identified by DOE/RL's reference to the RIDS schedule and the DDTS database, both of which are comprehensive enough to encompass any documents that would be responsive to HEAL's request.

August 27, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Neutron Technology Corporation

Date of Filing: July 28, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0432

Neutron Technology Corporation (NTC) files this Appeal under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) at 10 C.F.R. § 1004. As explained below, we will deny the Appeal.

NTC requested, pursuant to the FOIA, materials concerning the trial treatment of brain cancer patients using Boron Neutron Capture Therapy (BNCT).(1) The trials were conducted by Associated Universities, Incorporated (AUI) at DOE's Brookhaven National Laboratory (Brookhaven). The specific materials sought by NTC were the following.

1. Patient charts generated during the period September 14, 1994 to April 20, 1998.
2. Records showing the reactor power during patient treatment, the duration of neutron irradiation, and the protocol associated with each patient treated.
3. Documentation of post-irradiation calculations for each patient treated identifying actual treatment parameters for specified dose-delivery mechanisms.
4. Records showing dates of tumor diagnosis, treatment, recurrence, and patient death.
5. Documentation regarding the production, sale, and use of BPA-fructose during the clinical trials.(2)

Brookhaven responded to NTC's request for records by stating that the requested information was contained in clinical research center records that belonged to AUI, and was thus not government property. Brookhaven's response included part of a contract for the clinical trials. Brookhaven concluded that the requested records were not subject to release under the FOIA.

In its Appeal, NTC raises three issues: (a) that there were two contracts for clinical trials, but the response letter cited only one contract; (b) the information requested by NTC cannot be construed as patient records; and (c) public policy favors disclosure of the requested documents.

Before considering the issues raised by NTC, we will examine a question not explicit in the Appeal -- whether the material is subject to the FOIA in the first place. Brookhaven stated in its letter to NTC that, according to the terms of the contract, the requested material is "considered the property of the contractor. Thus, the information is not government property and not subject to the FOIA."

The FOIA generally provides that any person has a right of access to federal agency records, except to the extent that such records, or portions thereof, are protected from disclosure by one of the specified exemptions or exclusions. The term "agency records," however, is not defined in the FOIA. In interpreting this term, we apply a two-step analysis developed by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as AUI, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). The analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA; and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch ... or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). In addition, the courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard a private entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976) (Orleans), a case that did not involve the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "The question here is not whether the ... agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Orleans at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision- making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Although DOE contracted for AUI's services and exercised general control over the contract work, it did not supervise AUI's day-to-day operations. See Contract No. DE-AC02- 76CH00016. We therefore conclude that AUI is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although AUI is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, its records could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within DOE's control at the time of NTC's FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, Brookhaven personnel informed us that the materials requested by NTC were not in DOE's control at the time of the request. Based on these facts, these documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between DOE and the contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. DOE's regulations state that "when a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1).

Article 94 of the contract between DOE and AUI that concerns the materials requested by NTC states that:

(b) The following records are considered the property of the Contractor and are not within the scope of paragraph (a) [defining the government's records] above....

(2) .... Clinical Research Patient Records.

Modification No. M327 Supplemental Agreement to Contract No. DE-AC02-76CH00016.

Since the materials requested by NTC are Contractor records, we find that they are neither "agency records" within the meaning of the FOIA nor subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The number of contracts in question

NTC states in its Appeal that:

there were two government contractors during the period in question, but only one contractual provision was provided as the basis of denial. Did the other contract contain the same provision?

According to Brookhaven, NTC is correct in stating that two contracts have been awarded for BNCT research. Brookhaven personnel added, however, that work has not started on the second contract. All records that would be responsive to NTC's request, therefore, would have been generated under the contract referenced in Brookhaven's response.

The status of the requested material as "patient records"

NTC's next argument claims that:

the denial was a blanket denial for all the requests even though most of the other information requested would not fall under any reasonable definition of "patient records."

When we contacted Brookhaven about the claim that certain of the requested documents might not fall under the contract provision regarding patient records, personnel there assured us that all the materials requested by NTC fall under the category of "clinical research center patient records." Moreover, since the descriptions of the documents requested by NTC all plausibly refer to records generated in clinical treatment of patients, we see no reason to doubt Brookhaven’s characterization of the material.

Public policy as a basis for the release of the requested material there should be an overriding public policy to disclose this information to the general public because terminally diagnosed brain cancer patients and their doctors cannot assess all the treatment options without access to this information. There is no other source, public or private. Patient confidentiality can be protected... It just doesn't seem right to me that a government funded researcher should be able to sequester clinical research results for almost two years to the detriment of cancer patients and their doctors.

NTC's last claim is that:

As discussed above, the material requested by NTC is neither the property of the government nor subject to release under the FOIA. Thus, the issue of whether Brookhaven should release it on public policy grounds is moot.

In summary, we find no basis in NTC’s Appeal to remand this matter to Brookhaven or to order the release of the requested material. Accordingly, we will deny NTC’s Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Neutron Technology Corporation, Case No. VFA-0432, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0434, 27 DOE ¶ 80,160

September 2, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Scripps Institute of Oceanography

Date of Filing: July 31, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0434

On July 31, 1998, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) received an Appeal filed by the Scripps Institute of Oceanography (Scripps) from a determination issued to it by the Director of the DOE's Federal Energy Technology Center (hereinafter referred to as "the Director"). The Director issued this determination in response to a request for information that Scripps submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require that the Director release certain documents to Scripps.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its FOIA request, Scripps sought access to all correspondence between Biopraxis Inc., a DOE contractor, and the DOE pertaining to (1) the costs incurred by Scripps in performing subcontracts 96-001 and 96-003, (2) payments made by Biopraxis to Scripps relating to these contracts, (3) the reimbursement of Biopraxis by the DOE for payments made to Scripps, and (4) the termination of subcontracts 96-001 and 96-003 and settlement proposals relating to those terminations.

In her determination, the Director identified as responsive to Scripps' request all documents contained in the file entitled "General Correspondence - Biopraxis/Scripps Audit Issues." These documents consist of correspondence between Biopraxis and the DOE concerning alleged irregularities in Scripps' billing practices relating to subcontracts 96-001 and 96-003. Upon examination of the documents, the Director found that they are exempt in their entirety from mandatory release pursuant to Exemptions 4 and 7(A) of the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4) and (b)(7)(A).

Exemption 4 pertains to trade secrets and privileged or confidential commercial or financial information. With regard to this Exemption, the Director found that the responsive documents were voluntarily submitted by Biopraxis to the DOE, and consisted of commercial or financial information that Biopraxis would not ordinarily make available to the public. Therefore, pursuant to the holding of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals in Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (Critical Mass), the Director withheld these documents.

Exemption 7(A) protects from mandatory disclosure records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that release of the records could reasonably be expected to interfere with law enforcement proceedings. In her determination, the Director concluded that because these documents concern matters that are the subject of pending audits by the Defense Contract Audit Agency and the Department of Health and Human Services, and that release of the information could adversely affect these audits, the documents are protected from mandatory disclosure by Exemption 7(A).

In its appeal, Scripps contests the Director's application of these Exemptions. With regard to Exemption 4, Scripps argues that as a federal contractor, Biopraxis was required to report any allegedly improper billing by a subcontractor to the DOE. Therefore, Scripps claims, Biopraxis did not submit the responsive documents on a voluntary basis. Moreover, Scripps contends that the documents do not contain commercial or financial information within the meaning of Exemption 4.

Scripps further claims that Exemption 7(A) is inapplicable because the audits are not law enforcement proceedings. Moreover, even if the audits could be characterized as law enforcement proceedings, Scripps states that they have terminated, thereby making it unlikely that release of the documents would interfere in the audit process. Scripps therefore requests that we release the documents in their entirety.

II. Analysis

A. Exemption 4

Exemption 4 permits an agency to withhold from public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In interpreting this Exemption, the federal courts have distinguished between documents that are voluntarily submitted to the government, and documents that are provided on a non-voluntary basis. In order to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, documents containing privileged or confidential commercial or financial information that are supplied to the DOE on a voluntary basis need only be of a type that the submitter would not customarily release to the public. Critical Mass. Documents submitted on a non-voluntary basis, however, must meet a stricter standard of confidentiality in order to be exempt from mandatory disclosure. Such documents are confidential for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely to either impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. National Parks & Conservation Association v. Morton, 498 F 2d. 765, 770 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks).

Scripps' initial contention is that the withheld material does not meet the threshold requirement for protection under Exemption 4, i.e., that the documents do not contain commercial or financial information. Scripps argues that because it is a nonprofit organization, information concerning its performance under the subcontracts is not "commercial or financial" within the meaning of Exemption 4. We do not agree. The federal courts have repeatedly stated that the business dealings of nonprofit organizations may be considered "commercial" for Exemption 4 purposes. See, e.g., Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 880 (reports submitted by nonprofit consortium of nuclear power plants deemed "commercial in nature"); Sharyland Water Supply Corp. v. Block, 755 F.2d 397, 398 (5th Cir. 1985) (reports submitted by nonprofit water supply company deemed "clearly commercial"); American Airlines, Inc. v. National Mediation Board, 588 F.2d 863, 870 (employee "authorization cards" submitted by nonprofit union deemed "commercial"). The documents at issue here are correspondence between the DOE and Biopraxis concerning Scripps' performance under its subcontracts. They pertain to issues regarding commerce between Scripps and Biopraxis, and are thus clearly "commercial," as that term is used in Exemption 4.

Scripps' next contention is that the responsive documents were submitted on a non-voluntary basis, and that the National Parks criteria should therefore apply. Scripps does not, however, specify the regulatory or contractual provision under which Biopraxis was required to submit the documents in question, and we find no such requirement in the Biopraxis contract or in the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. Part 200 et seq. We therefore conclude that the documents were submitted on a voluntary basis. Furthermore, we find that Biopraxis does not customarily disclose commercial and financial information of the type contained in these documents to the public. In this regard, we note that most of the documents are captioned "Biopraxis Business Confidential And Proprietary." Others contain commercially sensitive data concerning Bipraxis' business dealings with the DOE and with Scripps, or information that could possibly be used against Biopraxis in any legal action filed by Scripps concerning the termination of the subcontracts, or concerning the substance of the communications between Biopraxis and the DOE. We therefore conclude that the Director properly applied Critical Mass in withholding the responsive documents.

However, even if we were to conclude that the documents were submitted on a non-voluntary basis, and that the National Parks criteria were therefore applicable, we would still find that those documents were properly withheld. As we stated previously, such documents are confidential for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely to either impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. Id. at 770. We believe that release of this type of information would make it more difficult for the government to obtain information from contractors regarding alleged inappropriate behavior on the part of their subcontractors. A contractor would have a significant incentive to be less forthcoming to the DOE about its subcontractor concerns if it believed that such information could later be used in a legal action against it by the subcontractor. For these reasons, we find that the Director properly applied Exemption 4 in withholding the responsive documents.

B. Exemption 7(A)

The Director also cited Exemption 7(A) in withholding the responsive documents. This exemption allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(i). We find this Exemption to be inapplicable in this case.

The threshold requirement in any Exemption 7 inquiry is whether the documents are compiled for law enforcement purposes, i.e., as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. See F.B.I. v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982); William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996) (Payne). An organization withholding material under Exemption 7 must have statutory authority to enforce a violation of a law or regulation within its authority. Church of Scientology v. Department of the Army, 611 F.2d 738, 748 (9th Cir. 1979) (remanding to Naval Investigative Service to show that investigation involved enforcement of statute or regulation within its authority). For example, we have consistently found that the DOE's Office of the Inspector General (IG) compiles reports for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7. See Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1997) ("The IG is a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate."); Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1997); Payne; McKinney. Applying these principles to the matter at hand, we find no indication in the record that the Federal Energy Technology Center has the "requisite law enforcement mandate" to invoke the protection of Exemption 7. See, e.g., Church of Scientology International v. IRS, 995 F.2d 916, 919 (9th Cir. 1993) (law enforcement mandate provided by enforcement provisions of federal tax code). Moreover, even if we were to assume that the Director could invoke Exemption 7(A) on behalf of the Defense Contract Audit Agency and the Department of Health and Human Services auditors, the record is devoid of any indication that these auditors possess any law enforcement mandate or authority. See generally 32 C.F.R. Part 387 and 45 C.F.R. Part 74 (Defense Contract Audit Agency and HHS auditors, respectively, authorized to perform accounting services regarding agency contracts and subcontracts). Without evidence of such a mandate, we cannot conclude that the withheld documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7.

Although we have found this exemption to be inapplicable, the Director properly withheld the responsive documents pursuant to Exemption 4. We will therefore deny Scripps' appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Scripps Oceanographic Institute on July 31, 1998 is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Heart of America Northwest

Date of Filing:August 5, 1998

Case Number:VFA-0435

On August 5, 1998, Heart of America Northwest (HOAN) filed an Appeal from determinations the Director of the Office of External Affairs (Director) of the Richland Operations Office of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to it on July 1, 1998 and July 7, 1998. In those determinations, the Director partially granted a request for information that HOAN filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In its request for information, HOAN sought information regarding various types of waste at the Hanford Site. In her July 1, 1998 determination, the Director released a copy of a document from Corpex Technologies, but she deleted information that identified a Corpex Technologies chemical product and its chemical composition pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In her July 7, 1998 determination, the Director released a copy of an estimated cost proposal Fluor Daniel Northwest, Inc. submitted to the DOE, but deleted specific types of cost information pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA. The types of cost information the Director deleted included general and administrative percentages, profits, and overhead rates.

Regarding the Corpex Technologies information, HOAN contends that the DOE should disclose the name and chemical composition of the Corpex Technologies chemical product and the “owners, generators or transporters” of this material. HOAN argues that the DOE cannot use Exemption 4 to withhold the name and chemical composition of the Corpex Technologies product because the release of this information is in the public interest. HOAN also states that the chemical composition of the Corpex Technologies chemical product is not a trade secret or commercial or financial information and is neither confidential nor privileged. Specifically, HOAN states that the Corpex Technologies chemical product is not a trade secret because it is a waste product created without any innovation or effort.

Furthermore, HOAN contends that the DOE should not have withheld Fluor Daniels Hanford’s overhead costs because other numbers in the released document allow one to calculate the deleted information. HOAN also contends that the DOE should have revealed the reasons why it did not designate hazardous materials as “dangerous materials” pursuant to the laws in the State of Washington. HOAN also states that the DOE’s Richland Office of External Affairs improperly delegated to other DOE regional offices the responsibility for responding to its FOIA request. Finally, HOAN argues that the DOE should not have disseminated responsive information to it in a “piecemeal” fashion without an index.

Analysis

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provided to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. In choosing between these two tests, we have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposal. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. See Glen M. Jameson, 25 DOE ¶ 80,191 (1996) (Jameson); Hanford Education Action League, 23 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1993).

As an initial matter, we note that HOAN is correct when it argues that Exemption 4 does not protect the name of the Corpex Technologies chemical product. A representative of the Director informed us that it should have released this information. See August 28, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. We agree. The name of the chemical product available for public sale, “Corpex 918," is not withholdable pursuant to the FOIA under these circumstances.

We do not agree with HOAN that Corpex 918 is itself a waste product and Corpex Technologies did not create it using any innovation or effort and thus the DOE should have released the chemical composition of Corpex 918. In Public Citizen Health Research Group v. FDA, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit defined a trade secret as “a secret, commercially valuable plan, formula, process, or device that is used for the making, preparing, compounding, or processing of trade commodities and that can be said to be the end product of either innovation or substantial effort.” 704 F.2d 1280, 1288 (D.C. Cir. 1983). The Director’s representative informed us that Corpex 918's formula is a unique commercial product for sale to the public for chemical decontamination and recycling of radiologically contaminated metals. See August 28, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. Since Corpex 918 is a unique product created to safely neutralize dangerous chemicals and to recycle radiologically contaminated metals, we do not agree with HOAN that Corpex 918 is a waste product created without any innovation or substantial effort. Rather, we find that it is an innovative product whose formula falls within the definition of a trade secret. Accordingly, we find that the chemical formula of Corpex 918 is a trade secret withholdable pursuant to Exemption 4.

HOAN also is incorrect when it argues that Exemption 4 does not protect the release of Fluor Daniels Hanford’s overhead costs because other numbers in the released document allow one to calculate the deleted information. The Director’s representative informed us that the DOE mistakenly released figures that might assist HOAN in calculating Fluor Daniels Hanford’s overhead costs for its estimated cost proposal concerning the “Navy RC Landhaul Road Improvements.” See August 28, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. Simply because the DOE mistakenly released information it meant to withhold is not a proper justification for releasing additional information. We find that an agency’s ability to withhold information pursuant to Exemption 4 does not evaporate simply because an agency inadvertently released some information it intended to withhold.

In appropriate cases, Exemption 4 protects the release of the type of information the requester seeks. We find that the overhead costs are confidential commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. The DOE obtained this material from a "person" as Exemption 4 requires, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). As stated above, we have consistently held that a submitter involuntarily submits information in response to a request for proposals. Thus, the information is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. We conclude that the overhead costs are confidential because their release would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. We have stated in the past that a competitor could use the release of cost information to undercut another firm's bids and thus effectively eliminate the disclosing firm from competition. See International Technology Corporation, 22 DOE ¶ 80,107 (1992); U.S. Rentals, 21 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1991). In this case, for example, any competitor could use overhead costs to easily determine how to adjust its proposal to offer more favorable terms than the submitter in a future bid process.

We have reviewed HOAN's FOIA request and have confirmed that HOAN did not specifically request the names of the "owners, generators, or transporters" of Corpex 918 in its original FOIA request. We have generally held that an appellant may not expand the scope of a request on appeal by requesting new information. F.A.C.T.S., 26 DOE ¶ 80,132 at 80,578 (1996); Energy Research Found., 22 DOE ¶ 80,114 at 80,529-30 (1992). Because this additional request clearly represents an expansion of the scope of HOAN's request, we must deny this portion of HOAN's appeal. Furthermore, the Director's representative confirmed that the DOE searched and did not find any information detailing the reasons why it did not designate hazardous materials as "dangerous materials" pursuant to the laws in the State of Washington. See August 31, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. Accordingly, we must deny this portion of HOAN's appeal.

We do not find any merit to HOAN's other arguments. First, HOAN argues that the DOE's Richland Office of External Affairs improperly delegated to other DOE regional offices the responsibility of responding to its FOIA request. In addition to searching at the DOE Richland Operations Office, the DOE Richland Office of External Affairs forwarded copies of HOAN's request to other DOE field offices based on its belief that other DOE field offices were also likely to possess responsive information. See August 28, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. The Director forwarded HOAN's request in an effort to help HOAN rather than require HOAN to make separate requests to the individual DOE field offices. We find nothing improper with the DOE Richland Office of External Affairs' customer-friendly forwarding of HOAN's request to facilitate the search process.

Finally, HOAN argues that the DOE should not have disseminated responsive information to it in a "piecemeal" fashion without an index. The Director's representative stated that if HOAN had requested that the DOE not release the documents to it in a "piecemeal" fashion, that the DOE would have complied with HOAN's request. The Director's representative informed us that the DOE sent HOAN copies of documents in a "piecemeal" fashion to expedite the response rather than delay the release until the DOE had culled together all of the 12,000 pages HOAN eventually received. See August 28, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. Finally, the Director's representative informed us that it sent to HOAN a copy of a document called the "matrix," which is the only extant DOE document similar to an index of responsive information. See August 28, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Attorney, and Yvonne Sherman, Richland Operations Office. However, since the FOIA does not require the DOE to create an index of documents the DOE provided in response to a FOIA request, we find no merit to HOAN's contention that the DOE should have released a nonexistent index.

The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by FOIA Group, Inc. on January 20, 1998, Case No. VFA-0369, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Director of the Office of External Affairs of the Richland Operations Office of the Department of Energy, who will release a new copy of the document containing the name of the Corpex Technologies chemical product.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: William Payne

Date of Filings: August 6, 1998

Case Numbers: VFA-0436

On August 6, 1998, William Payne (Payne) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office (DOE/AL) issued to him on March 30, 1998. The determination concerned a request for information that Payne submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would result in the release of any existing responsive material to Payne.

I. Background

On February 17, 1998, Payne filed a FOIA request with DOE/AL requesting access to:

1. All purchase requisitions, including any attached statement of work, issued by Sandia National Laboratories, Los Alamos National Laboratories, or DOE/AL between January 1, 1991 and February 17, 1998 to RSA Inc.
2. Copies of all invoices from RSA Inc. received by Sandia National Laboratories, Los Alamos National Laboratories, or DOE/AL between January 1, 1991 and February 17, 1998.

Letter from Payne to Elva Barfield, DOE/AL (February 17, 1998). DOE/AL, the Kirtland Area Office (oversight for Sandia National Laboratories (SNL)), and the Los Alamos Area Office (oversight for Los Alamos National Laboratories (LANL)) each conducted a search, but found no DOE records that were responsive to Payne's request. DOE/AL then supplied Payne with the names and addresses of individuals at SNL and LANL to contact regarding the existence of information responsive to his request. Letter from Elva Barfield, DOE/AL to Payne (March 30, 1998). On May 15, 1998, Payne sent an electronic mail message to the Secretary of Energy appealing AL's determination. Payne filed the present Appeal with OHA on August 6, 1998. In this Appeal, Payne asserts that the requested information should be considered agency records if DOE is properly managing its contractor relationships.

II. Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether the material requested can be considered "agency records" and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f)

(describing the scope of the term "agency" under the FOIA). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and that they are also not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as SNL and LANL, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

A. SNL and LANL Are Not Agencies Under the FOIA

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government-controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552 (f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the federal government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. V. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with the DOE, Lockheed Martin Corporation, through its wholly- owned subsidiary the Sandia Corporation, is the contractor responsible for maintaining and operating SNL. See Hellen Ruth Sutton-Pank, 25 DOE ¶ 80,178 (1996) (Sutton-Pank); William Kuntz, III, 25 DOE ¶ 80,157 (1995). Under a similar contractual relationship with the DOE, the University of California (UC) is the contractor responsible for maintaining and operating LANL. See Los Alamos Study Group, 26 DOE ¶ 80,212 (1997) (LASG). While the DOE obtained both organizations' services and exercises general control over the contract work, it does not supervise the day-to-day operations of either UC or Lockheed Martin Corporation. We therefore conclude that neither SNL or LANL can be considered an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

B. The Records Were Not Within DOE's Control At The Time Of Request

Although SNL and LANL are not agencies for the purposes of the FOIA, their records relevant to Payne's request could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time Payne made his FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, DOE/AL has informed us that the information that Payne seeks was not in the agency's control at the time of the appellant's request. See Electronic Mail Message from E. Barfield, DOE/AL to W. Schwartz, OHA (August 12, 1998). Based on these facts, these documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

C. The Contracts Provide That Procurement Records Are Contractor Property

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between the DOE and that contractor provides that they are the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1).

We next look to the contracts between DOE and the two laboratories to determine the status of the requested records. Both contracts provide that all records "acquired or generated" by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of DOE except "records related to any procurement action by the [contractor]." Contract DE-AC04-94AL85000, Modification No. M009, Clause 10(a) (SNL); Contract No. W-7405-ENG-36, Paragraph b(8) (LANL). See also LASG, 26 DOE at 80,842; Sutton-Pank, 25 DOE at 80,694. Because the documents at issue are related to procurement actions of SNL and LANL, we find that the requested records are not agency records and thus not subject to release under DOE regulations.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on August 6, 1998 by William Payne, OHA Case No. VFA-0436, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: William Payne

Date of Filing: August 13, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0438

This decision concerns an Appeal filed on August 13, 1998 by William Payne (Appellant). The Appellant submitted a request for information to the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (IG) seeking copies of "all investigative reports authored at DOE in response to [the Appellant's] allegation that NSA willfully and knowingly attempted to sabotage DOE/Sandia cryptographic projects." This request was submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Determination Letter at 1. On July 6, 1998, the IG issued a determination in response to that request, redacting the names of individuals and other identifying information from two of the five documents it provided to the Appellant. * On August 13, 1998, the Appellant filed the present Appeal, contending that the IG's withholding of the information was improper.

While the FOIA generally requires that information held by government agencies be released to the public upon request, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA, which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Only Exemptions 6 and 7(C) are at issue in the present case.

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding based on either civil or criminal statutes. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982); Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Williams v. IRS, 479 F.2d 317, 318 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom. Donolon v. IRS, 414 U.S. 1024 (1973). By law, the IG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. The IG is, therefore, a classic example of an organization with a law enforcement mandate. In the present case the IG's investigatory actions were clearly within this statutory mandate.

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, if privacy interests exist, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 489 U.S. 769, 773 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3.

The IG has found a privacy interest in the identities of the individuals whose names have been withheld. The Determination letter states in pertinent part:

Names and information that would tend to disclose the identity of certain individuals have been withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Individuals involved in an Office of Inspector General investigation, which in this case includes sources of information, are entitled to privacy protections so that they will be free from harassment, intimidation and other personal intrusions.

Determination Letter at 1. Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals whose names are contained in investigative files. Safecard Services, Inc. v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991); KTVY-TV v. United States, 919 F.2d 1465, 1469 (10th Cir. 1990) (finding that withholding identity necessary to avoid harassment of individual); Cucarro v. Secretary of Labor, 770 F.2d 355, 359 (3d Cir. 1985). Accordingly, we have followed the courts' lead. James L. Schwab, 21 DOE 80,117 at 80,556 (1991); Lloyd R. Makey, 20 DOE 80,129 (1990). Therefore, we find that release of the individuals' identities would result in significant invasions of privacy.

In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court narrowed the scope of the public interest in the context of the FOIA. The Court found that only information which contributes significantly to the public's understanding of the operations or activities of the Government is within "the ambit of the public interest which the FOIA was enacted to serve." Id. The Court therefore found that unless the public would learn something directly about the workings of government from the release of a document, its disclosure is not "affected with the public interest." Id.; see also National Ass'n of Retired Employees v. Horner, 879 F.2d 873, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1078 (1990). We fail to see how release of the identities of individuals in the present case would inform the public about the operations and activities of Government. Accordingly, we find that there is little or no public interest in disclosure of the individuals's identities.

After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against an insubstantial or non-existent public interest, we find that release of information revealing an individual's identity would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Accordingly, we find that the identities of the individuals were properly withheld under Exemptions 6 and 7(C). See, e.g., Tod Rockefeller, 26 DOE 80,238 (1997).

The Appellant also requests that he be provided with a Vaughn index, i.e. an index identifying each responsive document, the exemption under which it is being withheld and an explanation of why that exemption is applicable. See Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C. Cir. 1980). On previous occasions, we have stated that, although such an index may be required of the agency when it is in litigation with a FOIA requester, this degree of specificity is not required at the administrative stages of a FOIA request. See, e.g., Rockwell International, 21 DOE 80,105 at 80,527 (1991); Natural Resources Defense Council, 20 DOE 80,145 at 80,627 (1990). At the administrative level, determinations need only include a general description of the withheld material and a statement of the reason for the withholding. Therefore, we reject the Appellant's request for a Vaughn index.

While we are strongly committed to keeping the public fully informed about DOE actions, we are also mindful of the need to preserve the privacy rights of individuals. By releasing the responsive document with only those redactions necessary to prevent identification of specific individuals, which is what has been done here, the agency can provide as much information as possible while safeguarding individual privacy rights.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by William Payne on August 13, 1998, Case Number VFA-0438, is hereby denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell

Date of Filing: September 8, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0443

The law firm of Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell (Baker) files this Appeal under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy at 10 C.F.R. § 1004. As explained below, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) will grant the Appeal.

Baker filed a request for documents with the Department's Golden Field Office (Golden) on April 28, 1998. In the request, Baker sought "all contracts entered into pursuant to Request for Proposal No. RAR-4-14061, ?Systems Engineering Approaches to Development of Advanced Residential Buildings.'"

This case represents the second time that Baker's request for these documents has been before the OHA. On the first occasion, Baker appealed Golden's initial response to its request. In its response, Golden released all the responsive documents it located in its files except one set of records. The records withheld by Golden concerned a contract between the National Renewable Energy Laboratory and Steven Winter Associates (Winter). Golden withheld the Winter documents under Exemption 4 of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), discussed below, and Baker appealed. We found that Golden's determination did not provide a reasonably specific justification for its assertion of Exemption 4. We therefore remanded the matter to Golden for a new determination. Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell, Case No. VFA-0430 (August 20, 1998).

In its second determination letter to Baker, Golden again withheld the Winter documents under Exemption 4, but provided a new justification. Baker then filed the present appeal.

The FOIA generally requires that agency records be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). However, the FOIA provides nine exemptions for specific types of information that the agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The exemption asserted in the present case, Exemption 4, permits an agency to withhold from release "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4).

In its second determination letter, Golden claims that the withheld documents consist of "privileged or confidential commercial or financial information." Based on this assertion, Golden withheld the Winter documents in their entirety. However, even when the requested material contains matter that may be withheld, the FOIA requires that "any reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b).

Exemption 4 rarely permits the withholding of documents in their entirety. Tri-State Drilling, 26 DOE ¶ 80,202 (1997). For example, the mere fact that the contents of a document may be useful to competitors in future bids is not sufficient ground to withhold the material unless the material is unique. Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, 20 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1990). A finding that material is "unique" under FOIA standards has generally been limited to cases where the material consists of specific technical processes that are the property of, or have been developed by, the submitter. Government Sales Consultants, 13 DOE ¶ 80,115 (1985).

On the other hand, information such as the total price of a contract, after the contract has been awarded, does not reveal the submitter's bidding strategy; thus, it cannot normally be withheld under Exemption 4. Covington & Burling, 20 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1990). In addition, we have found that contractual items such as rental car charges, airfares, and postage are not "unique methods and procedures," and cannot generally be withheld under Exemption 4. Greenpeace USA, 26 DOE ¶ 80,219 (1997).

We have reviewed a sample of the Winter documents. We cannot find that all of the information contained in the documents, on its face, meets the requirements for withholding under Exemption 4. Furthermore, Golden has provided no reasons in its determination letter that would establish that all the material can be withheld under Exemption 4.

Consequently, on remand, Golden must conduct an additional review of any information in the Winter documents that it seeks to withhold from Baker, so that it can determine whether the documents contain information that can be segregated and released to the public. The Authorizing Official must review each category of material withheld and determine whether its release could cause the submitter substantial competitive harm or impair the government's ability to obtain similar information in the future. International- Hough Division/Dresser, 12 DOE ¶ 80,140 (1985). Any determination that Winter would suffer substantial competitive harm, or that the government's ability to obtain would be impaired, must be supported by well-founded reasons presented in a new determination letter to Baker. See W.N. Gates Co., 10 DOE ¶ 80,111 (1982).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell, Case Number VFA-0443, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to Golden Field Office, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

October 9, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Missouri River Energy Services

Date of Filing: September 9, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0444

On September 9, 1998, Missouri River Energy Services (Missouri) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on August 10, 1998, by the Department of Energy's Western Area Power Administration (WAPA). That determination concerned a request for information that Missouri submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, WAPA would be ordered to release the requested information or issue a new determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information which may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On August 28, 1997, Missouri filed an extensive FOIA request seeking copies of several documents relating to transmission rate analyses conducted by WAPA's Upper Great Plains Regional Office. In its August 10, 1998 determination letter, WAPA identified a number of documents responsive to Missouri's request. Specifically, WAPA identified one box of responsive documents and 20 computer disks. However, WAPA withheld 56 documents in their entirety pursuant to FOIA Exemptions 4 and 5. See Determination Letter at 1.

On September 9, 1998, Missouri filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). In its Appeal, Missouri challenges WAPA's determination and asserts that WAPA failed to: (1) produce an index of the documents it provided and indicate whether it segregated non-exempt material from those documents; (2) specifically identify the exemption applicable to each withheld document stated in the determination; (3) provide an adequate justification for applying Exemptions 4 and 5 to each of the withheld documents; and (4) provide sufficient information in its determination to permit Missouri to make a meaningful appeal. See Appeal Letter at 1 and 2.

II. Analysis

In its Appeal, Missouri contends, inter alia, that WAPA has failed to identify the specific exemption applicable to each withheld document identified in the Response and failed to provide an adequate justification for applying Exemptions 4 and 5 to the withheld documents. It is well established that a FOIA determination must have reasonably specific justifications for withholding all or parts of documents responsive to a FOIA request. See, e.g., Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, 22 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,517 (1992); Davis Wright & Jones, 19 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,509 (1989) (and cases cited therein). Conclusory and generalized claims by agency officials that material is exempt from disclosure are not acceptable. We strongly adhere to this position so that the requesting party may prepare an adequate appeal, and so that this Office may make an effective review of the initial agency determination. Thus, "when an agency seeks to withhold information it must provide a relatively detailed justification, specifically identifying the reasons why a particular exemption is relevant and correlating those claims with the particular part of a withheld document to which they apply." Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,528 (1984). A sufficiently detailed explanation should indicate the issues addressed in a document and the functions of the document which render it exempt from mandatory disclosure. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. DOE, 617 F.2d 854, 861 (D.C. Cir. 1980); Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136, 1145 (D.C. Cir. 1975); Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE at 80,528. These requirements are reflected in the DOE regulations, which require that a response to a properly submitted FOIA request include:

a statement of the reason for the denial, containing as applicable . . . (i) [a] reference to the specific exemption authorizing the withholding of the record, and to the extent consistent with the purposes of the exemption, a brief explanation of how the exemption applies to the record withheld, and a statement of why a discretionary release is not appropriate.

10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1)(i).

In past cases, we have held that a general discussion of the policies underlying the various exemptions that fails to explain why the specific documents withheld fall within the claimed exemption is inadequate. Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE at 80,528 (and cases cited therein). Instead, we have required the agency to support its application of an exemption providing the type of justification required by Arnold & Porter. In this case we find that WAPA's Determination Letter does not permit either an adequate appeal or an effective review of its basis for withholding documents.

A. Adequacy of the Exemption 4 Justification

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either: (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks).

In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993). By contrast, information a submitter provides to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. While it appears in WAPA's Determination Letter that it applied the National Parks test, it is still unclear whether the withheld documents were in fact involuntarily submitted.

Therefore, WAPA's Determination Letter does not meet the threshold tests of Exemption 4. Moreover, the Determination Letter does not specifically indicate which particular documents are withheld under Exemption 4. In addition, even if WAPA was correct in applying the National Parks test, it did not provide a sufficient explanation of why release of the information it withheld would cause competitive harm to the submitters. Rather, the letter merely contains a general statement that competitive harm would occur. Consequently, we hold that WAPA's blanket justification in this case is too general to support the invocation of Exemption 4.

B. Adequacy of Exemption 5 Justification

WAPA, in its Determination Letter, also seeks to invoke Exemption 5 to justify withholding a number of documents. Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents which are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege, and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corporation v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). In the present case, the Determination Letter fails to disclose which documents are specifically withheld under Exemption 5 and how the applicable privilege specifically applies to the withheld documents. Consequently, WAPA's blanket justification is also too general to support the invocation of Exemption 5.

III. Conclusion

As discussed above, we have concluded that WAPA has failed to specifically identify the exemption applicable to each withheld document stated in its Determination Letter and has failed to provide an adequate justification for withholding documents under FOIA Exemptions 4 and 5. Accordingly, we will remand this Appeal to WAPA to issue another, more detailed Determination Letter that is consistent with the standards we have outlined above. (1) Specifically, for each document withheld in full or in part, WAPA should include a statement of the reason for denial, a brief explanation of how the exemption applies to the record withheld, and a statement of why discretionary release is not appropriate. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1). WAPA should further review each document for the possible segregation and release of non-exempt material. In making its determination, WAPA may group similar documents together and provide one justification for each group of documents.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Missouri River Energy Services on September 9, 1998, Case Number VFA- 0444, is hereby granted in part as set forth below in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Western Area Power Administration for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)As noted earlier, Missouri contends that it should be provided with a Vaughn index, i.e. an index identifying each responsive document, the exemption under which it is being withheld and an explanation why that exemption is applicable, or in the alternative a similar document describing each withholding. See Appeal Letter at 3. On previous occasions, we have stated that, although such an index may be required when an agency is in litigation with a FOIA requester, this degree of specificity is not required at the administrative stages of a FOIA request. See, e.g., Rockwell International, 21 DOE ¶ 80,105 at 80,527 (1991). At the administrative levels, determinations need only include a general description of the withheld material, and a statement of the reason for withholding each document. Therefore, we reject Missouri's request for a Vaughn index. However, as stated above, in its new determination WAPA should provide Missouri with a general description of all withheld information, identify the exemption applicable to each withheld document (or group) and the reasons for any withholdings.

Case No. VFA-0447, 27 DOE ¶ 80,167

October 28, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Tod N. Rockefeller

Date of Filings: September 29, 1998

Case Numbers: VFA-0447

On September 29, 1998, Edward Slavin, Jr., Esq. (Slavin), filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) on behalf of his client Tod N. Rockefeller (Rockefeller) in response to a determination that DOE's Albuquerque Operations Office (AL) issued to Rockefeller on September 24, 1998. The determination concerned a request for information that Rockefeller submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would result in AL releasing any existing responsive material to Rockefeller free of charge.

I. Background

On August 4, 1998, Slavin, on behalf of Rockefeller, filed a FOIA request with AL requesting copies of: (1) the telephone records of several AL employees, (2) any DOE legal bills for whistleblower issues, (3) legal audits of AL and DOE's Carlsbad Area Office (CAO), (4) a government ethics file for a former CAO manager, (5) and any and all documents regarding Tod Rockefeller that exist in AL, CAO, OHA, DOE Headquarters, or Westinghouse, contractor for CAO. Letter from Slavin to Tyler Przybylek, Chief Counsel, AL (August 4, 1998) (Request Letter). Slavin stated that "a full fee waiver is requested in the public interest in preventing, detecting and exposing government fraud. . . . " Request Letter at 8. According to Slavin, "DOE site workers and managers have a right to know the truth of all of the matters covered by this request." Id.

AL denied Rockefeller's request for a fee waiver. Letter from Elva Barfield, AL, to Slavin (September 24, 1998). According to AL, both the Merit Systems Protection Board and the Office of Special Counsel of the Department of Labor had found Rockefeller's whistleblower allegations to be without merit. Thus, AL concluded that Rockefeller's current action was "personal in nature" and that Slavin, as Rockefeller's attorney, made the FOIA request for Slavin's own commercial interest. AL went on to state that it determined that Rockefeller's request was not likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operation and activities of the government. Id. Thus, AL denied Rockefeller's request for a fee waiver. Slavin then filed this Appeal, asserting that AL failed to properly weigh the fee waiver criteria and the public interest. Letter from Slavin to OHA Director (September 29, 1998) (Appeal).

II. Analysis

The FOIA generally requires that requesters pay fees for the processing of their requests. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(i); see also 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a). However, the Act provides:

Documents shall be furnished without any charge or at a charge reduced below the fees established under clause (ii) if disclosure of the information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government and is not primarily in the commercial interest of the requester.

5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii) (1988 ed.).

Statutory Standard For Fee Waiver

The burden of satisfying the two-prong test for a fee waiver is on the requester. See International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 26 DOE ¶ 80,153 (1997) (IBEW); Larson v. CIA, 843 F.2d 1481, 1483 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (per curiam). The DOE has implemented the statutory standard for fee waiver in its FOIA regulations. See 10 C.F. R. § 1004.9(a)(8). Those regulations set forth the following four factors which must be considered by the agency in order to determine whether the first statutory fee waiver condition has been met, i.e., whether disclosure of the requested information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of government operations or activities:

(A) The subject of the request: Whether the subject of the requested records concerns "the operations or activities of the government;" (Factor A)

(B) The informative value of the information to be disclosed: Whether the disclosure is "likely to contribute" to an understanding of government operations or activities; (Factor B)

(C) The contribution to an understanding by the general public of the subject likely to result from disclosure; (Factor C) and

(D) The significance of the contribution to public understanding: Whether the disclosure is likely to contribute "significantly" to public understanding of government operations or activities (Factor D).

10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(i). If the DOE finds that a request satisfies these four factors, it must also consider the following two factors in order to determine whether disclosure of the information is primarily in the commercial interest of the requester:

(A) The existence and magnitude of a commercial interest: Whether the requester has a commercial interest that would be furthered by the requested disclosure; and, if so

(B) The primary interest in disclosure: Whether the magnitude of the identified commercial interest of the requester is sufficiently large, in comparison with the public interest in disclosure, that disclosure is "primarily in the commercial interest of the requester."

10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(ii). We have performed a de novo review of the merits of Rockefeller's request for a fee waiver and find that Rockefeller should not be granted a fee waiver for the reasons described below.

Disclosure Would Not Be In The Public Interest

Factor A asks us to determine whether the subject of the requested documents concerns the operations or activities of the government. A fee waiver is appropriate only where the subject matter of the requested material concerns government operations or activities. See IBEW, 26 DOE at 80,671. We have previously found that standard telephone billing records, without any evidence linking them to identified government operations, have no informative value in relation to government operations or activities. See William H. Payne, 24 DOE ¶ 80,134 at 80,857 (1994). Thus, we find that disclosure of this part of Rockefeller's request is not in the public interest. However, the remaining items requested by Rockefeller (DOE legal bills related to whistleblower issues, legal audits of AL and CAO, a government ethics file for a former CAO manager, and all documents regarding Rockefeller) are likely to contain information that specifically concerns government operations or activities. See William H. Payne, 25 DOE ¶ 80,184 (1996) (stating that subject matter of law firm invoices discloses how the government spends taxpayer money). Therefore, we conclude that the subject of most of the requested material meets the requirement of Factor A.

Factor B requires a consideration of whether the disclosure of information is "likely to contribute" to the public's understanding of government operations and activities. See Seehuus Associates, 23 DOE ¶ 80,180 (1994) (Seehuus). If the information is publicly available or common knowledge among the general population, release to the requester would not contribute to the public understanding. Seehuus, 23 DOE at 80,694. The material at issue here is not in the public domain, and could contribute to the public's understanding of how the government deals with whistleblower issues. Thus, the requested information meets this requirement.

Factor C asks us to determine whether the requested material would contribute to the general public's understanding of the subject. To meet this test, the requester must have the ability and intention to disseminate this information to the public. See IBEW, 26 DOE at 80,671; James L. Schwab, 22 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1992). See also Judicial Watch, Inc. v. Department of Justice, No. 97-

2089, slip op. at 13 (D.D.C. Jul. 14, 1998) (finding failure to establish intent and ability to convey information fatal to request for fee waiver); Carney v. Department of Justice, 19 F.3d 807, 814 (2d Cir. 1994) (stating that relevant inquiry is whether requester will disseminate the disclosed records to a reasonably broad pool of interested persons). We find that Slavin's statement that "Rockefeller merely seeks to share information about . . . his case with the public" is insufficient and does not demonstrate either Slavin or Rockefeller's intent or ability to meaningfully disseminate the information to the public. See McClellan Ecological Seepage Situation v. Carlucci, 835 F.2d 1282, 1285 (9th Cir. 1987) (McClellan) (conclusory statements will not support a fee waiver request). Therefore, we conclude that release of the requested material would not contribute to the general public's understanding of the subject, and thus does not meet the requirement of Factor C.

Factor D requires us to consider the significance of the contribution made under Factor C. Because we have previously determined that the release of the material would not contribute to public understanding under Factor C, we find that there is no significance to the contribution. Therefore, we conclude that the requested information does not meet the requirement of Factor D.

III. Conclusion

Because the requester has not met his burden of satisfying all four factors of the fee waiver regulation, we need not consider whether disclosure of the information is primarily in the commercial interest of the requester.(1) Accordingly, the Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on September 29, 1998 by Tod Rockefeller, OHA Case No. VFA-0447, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review. Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)We note, however, that we do not agree with AL's conclusion that Slavin should be designated a commercial requester because his client did not prevail in previous whistleblower actions. We have no evidence that Rockefeller's current action is "personal in nature" as AL contends, or that Rockefeller is not pursuing a new action seeking compensation or retribution for wrongs he allegedly suffered. Courts have held that where a requester seeks information to assist in a suit seeking "compensation or retribution," such a suit is not a "commercial interest" within the meaning of the FOIA. See McClellan, 835 F.2d at 1285 (finding no commercial interest in records sought in furtherance of requesters' tort claim). See also Government Accountability Project, 25 DOE ¶ 80,203 (1996) (granting fee waiver to public interest law firm); Government Accountability Project, 23 DOE ¶ 80,169 at 80,668 (1993); Muffoletto v. Sessions, 760 F.Supp. 268, 277-78 (E.D.N.Y. 1991) (finding no commercial use when records were sought to defend against state court action to recover debts).

October 30, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Hans M. Kristensen

Date of Filing:October 1, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0448

On October 1, 1998, Hans M. Kristensen (Kristensen) filed an Appeal from a determination issued on September 10, 1998, by the Department of Energy's (DOE) FOIA and Privacy Act Division (FPAD). In that determination, FPAD responded to a request for information filed by Kristensen on August 1, 1998, under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA generally requires that federal agencies release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of an agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE release to the public a document exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest and not contrary to other laws. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. BACKGROUND

In its request, Kristensen sought, among other information, the most recently updated Stockpile Stewardship and Management Plan (the Green Book). On September 10, 1998, FPAD issued a determination releasing a copy of the Unclassified Second Annual Update of the Green Book to Kristensen. This document was a redacted version of the classified Green Book meant for widespread dissemination to the public. FPAD apparently assumed that by releasing the public version of the Green Book, it had fully responded to this portion of Kristensen's request, since the determination letter did not indicate that portions of the Green Book were being withheld and did not advise Kristensen of his appeal rights.

On October 1, 1998, Kristensen filed the present Appeal contending that by releasing the unclassified version of the Green Book to him, FPAD was in effect withholding those portions of the Green Book that appear only in the original classified version of the Green Book.

II. ANALYSIS

We agree with Kristensen. By releasing only the public version of the Green Book FPAD withheld those portions of the document that were redacted from the original Green Book. The FOIA requires that the agency provide the requester with a written determination notifying the requester of the agency's intentions to withhold responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). Such a determination allows the requester to decide whether the agency's response to its request was adequate and proper and provides this office with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal.

It therefore follows that the agency has an obligation to ensure that its determination letters clearly indicate which information was withheld, and specify the exemption(s) under which information was withheld. Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,205 at 80,767 (1996). Without an adequately informative determination letter, the requester and the review authority must speculate about the adequacy and appropriateness of the agency's determinations. Id. Since the determination letter should have indicated that it was withholding portions of the Green Book and should have specifically indicated the exemptions under which that information is being withheld, we find that it is inadequate.

Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to the FPAD with instructions to issue a new determination letter. The new determination letter should specifically identify any information it is withholding from the requested document and indicate the exemption(s) under which that information is being withheld. The new determination letter should also explain why any withholdings under the exemption(s) are appropriate.

III. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, we are remanding this matter to the FOIA and Privacy Acts Division with instructions promptly to issue a new determination letter that complies with the requirements discussed above.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Hans M. Kristensen on October 1, 1998, Case Number VFA-0448, is hereby granted and remanded to the FOIA and Privacy Acts Division for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case Number: VFA-0449

On October 13, 1998, Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, Charles Selvidge and Sam Selvidge filed an appeal from a determination that the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (ORO) issued on September 1, 1998. The determination responded to a request for information the Selvidges filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The appellants challenge the adequacy of ORO's search, ORO's delay in responding to their request, ORO's failure to declassify documents, and a number of procedural matters.

I. Background

On September 22, 1997, the appellants requested from the DOE all documents concerning five categories of information, and requested that the responsive documents be declassified, if necessary, before their release. Those five categories are:

1. DOE's failure ... to decontaminate, decommission or deactivate the Molten Salt Reactor (MSRE) at Oak Ridge National Laboratory ... including documentation on all explosions, nuclear criticalities, radiation and chemical leaks [and] safety deficiencies ... at the facility, as well as all contractual documents and DOE orders or other instructions relating to the contractor's duties with respect to the [MSRE].
2. The entire history of the [MSRE] Building complex and environs, including toxic and hazardous substances used prior to the [MSRE] ...
3. Medical records of all DOE, contractor and subcontractor employees who ever worked in the [MSRE] Building ...
4. The identity and effects of the nearly 100 "classified" substances at Oak Ridge.
5. The entire contents of the Records Holding Task Group in Oak Ridge, Tennessee.

ORO issued a partial response to this request on October 21, 1997. In that response ORO informed the Selvidges that it was providing some documents responsive to Items 1 and 2 of their request, but that it was continuing to search for additional responsive documents. With respect to Item 3, ORO notified the requesters that it was still identifying the workers at the MSRE facility, and after they were all identified a search for their medical records would begin. ORO stated that it found no documents responsive to Item 4 of the request. Finally, it explained that the nature and scope of the request's Item 5 were so broad that it could not respond without additional assistance from the requesters, estimating that it would take 80 person-years to declassify all the information that responded to the request as submitted. Instead, it proposed to provide the requesters with a list of the contents of the responsive database as a finding aid, from which the requesters could then select documents that they would like to view.

On September 1, 1998, ORO again responded to the requesters, providing a copy of the list of the contents of the database that it found to be responsive to Item 5 of the request. The listing, entitled "1998-RHA-241 RHTG System Master Report," itemizes the records held by the Records Holding Task Group at Oak Ridge. Certain information was deleted from the copy of the listing that ORO provided to the requesters. However, an index accompanied the listing, in which ORO detailed the reasons for withholding the information from the requesters. The reasons fell into two categories: either the information was deleted pursuant to Exemptions 1 and 3 of the FOIA, or an entire page was withheld because the releasability of information contained on that page was "being coordinated with external agencies and other Department of Energy offices. As soon as those coordinated reviews are completed, a final version of the Report will be issued and you will be provided updates." September 1, 1998 ORO Response.

On October 13, 1998, the Selvidges filed their appeal to the September 1 determination. In their appeal they challenge ORO's failure to conduct an adequate search within reasonable time limits, the length of time it has taken ORO to respond to their initial request for information, ORO's failure to declassify and release documents responsive to their request, and the quality of the "Vaughn" index that ORO provided in its response. (1) Each of these bases for appeal will be addressed below.

II. Analysis

A. Delay

The Selvidges argue, inter alia, that ORO has failed to respond fully to their request despite the passage of more than one year. This Office has no jurisdiction to hear such an allegation. Our jurisdiction, which arises from the DOE regulations at 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8, requires the issuance of a determination letter by a DOE official, in which the DOE has taken some action adverse to the requester. Although ORO has provided some documents responsive to the first and second categories of this request, it has consistently stated that those responses are partial responses, and that it intends to provide further response to those portions of the request, as well as an initial response to the third category of the request. Consequently, ORO has not completed its determination with respect to the first, second, and third categories of the request. This Office cannot review ORO's partial responses because they do not constitute complete determinations. Nevertheless, the Selvidges are correct in that ORO has failed to complete its determination within the time limits set by statute and regulation. Under those circumstances, the FOIA explicitly provides that requesters may seek relief in the federal district courts. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(C). We note, however, that the federal courts have recognized that federal agencies frequently are unable to meet the statutory processing deadlines due to large backlogs of pending cases and inadequate resources. See, e.g., Open America v. Watergate Special Prosecution Force, 547 F.2d 605 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

By contrast, ORO informed the requesters in its October 21, 1997 letter that it had no documents responsive to the fourth category of information sought in their request. That determination is ripe for review and will be addressed below. With respect to the fifth category of the request, ORO's determination to withhold information from a document is subject to review by this Office and is addressed below. However, its failure to produce additional documents responsive to the fifth category is not now subject to our review. Because ORO has indicated its willingness to continue its search with the cooperation of the requesters, we conclude that it has not issued a complete determination concerning this portion of the request. Only that portion of its partial response to the fifth category of the request in which ORO withheld information constitutes a determination that we can review.

B. "No Documents" Response

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

After receiving this appeal, we contacted ORO to find out about the search it conducted in response to the Selvidges' request for "[t]he identity and effects of the nearly 100 ?classified' substances at Oak Ridge." Amy Rothrock, the FOIA Officer for ORO, explained the background for this fourth category of the request and the manner in which she searched for responsive documents. According to the FOIA Officer, the topic arose in a public meeting at which a Tennessee state employee informed the audience that the state had investigated the presence of some 100 substances at Oak Ridge, of which 20 were classified. She then determined that two offices at Oak Ridge might possibly have a list of the 100 substances, and contacted each one. At the Office of the Assistant Manager for Environment, Safety and Quality, she spoke with the project coordinator of the State of Tennessee Health Studies for Dose Reconstruction. She also questioned the Oak Ridge Office of Declassification, to learn whether it had any record of a document that contain a list of the 20 allegedly classified substances. Neither office informed the FOIA Officer that it possessed any responsive documents.

Based on our review of the details of ORO's search as set forth above, particularly in light of the fact that the source of the underlying statement was not associated with the DOE, we find that ORO took steps reasonably calculated to uncover the documents the Selvidges sought. ORO personnel consulted presumably reliable sources in ORO offices that would likely possess the information sought, were any to exist. There is no information of which we are aware that would point to other locations at ORO where additional responsive documents might exist, and the FOIA clearly does not require ORO to conduct an exhaustive search through all of its document holdings to make certain that it has no other documents responsive to the Selvidges' request. We therefore find that ORO's search concerning the fourth category of the request was adequate to meet the requirements of the FOIA. In this respect, the present Appeal will be denied.

C. Partial Response Concerning the RHTG Records

In its October 21, 1997 determination, ORO responded to the fifth category of the Selvidges' request for documents by stating that the scope of the request was so broad that it would require a declassification review that would take an estimated 80 person-years to complete. Instead it proposed to provide the requesters with printout of the contents of the Records Holding Task Group (RHTG) database. When review of that printout was complete, the requesters would be provided with a copy, from which they could select individual documents to be declassified and released, if possible. On September 1, 1998, ORO provided a copy of that printout, from which subject-identifying information had been deleted from some records listed. ORO informed the requesters that the information was withheld pursuant to Exemptions 1 and 3 of the FOIA and provided an explanation of each withholding in the form of an index, which ORO identified as a "Vaughn" index.

We have reviewed the manner in which ORO processed the fifth category of this request and find that it was appropriate. After performing a preliminary search, ORO determined that retrieving and reviewing all responsive documents would be an immense task. To provide better service and to avoid unnecessary delay and expense, it released a document that identified the universe of responsive documents and described them. ORO did not consider this a full response to the request. Rather, it identified the listing as a "finding aid," and instructed the requesters to select documents from that list that they wished to obtain. To the extent that ORO has not fully responded to this portion of the request, it has failed to respond within the statutory time limits, and the requesters' recourse is in the federal courts, as discussed above.

The listing ORO provided, however, was in a redacted form. Information contained in that document was withheld under Exemptions 1 and 3 of the FOIA. Despite the contentions raised in the appeal, ORO followed the appropriate procedures for handling a responsive document that had been identified as containing classified information. It referred the document to the Office of Declassification (OD) for a classification review, to determine whether the information claimed as classified could be declassified under current classification guidance. OD performed the required review and determined that those portions of the document continued to be considered classified. On that basis, those portions were withheld from the requesters under Exemptions 1 and 3, and the DOE official responsible for those withholdings was named in ORO's determination letter. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.6. That determination is ripe for review, and pursuant to the regulations governing appeals of denials of requests for classified information, we have referred this portion of the appeal to the Director of Security Affairs for appellate review. (2) See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(f). When that office completes its review, we will issue a final agency determination on the withholdings under these Exemptions.

Finally, the Selvidges assert that ORO provided a Vaughn index that is "facially inadequate, uninformative and misleading." A Vaughn index is recognized in the context of FOIA as an index identifying each responsive document, the exemption under which it is being withheld and an explanation why that exemption is applicable, or in the alternative a similar document describing each withholding. See Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D.C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 977 (1974). On previous occasions, we have stated that, although such an index may be required when an agency is in litigation with a FOIA requester, this degree of specificity is not required at the administrative stages of a FOIA request. See, e.g., Missouri River Energy Services, 27 DOE ¶ 80,___, Case No. VFA-0444 (October 9, 1998); Rockwell International, 21 DOE ¶ 80,105 at 80,527 (1991). At the administrative levels, agency determinations to deny release of documents need only provide a general description of the withheld material, and a statement of the reason for withholding each document. ORO's index, which explains the basis for each withholding from the database printout, clearly meets this standard. The index permits the appellants to formulate the basis for their appeal, and permits the appellate authority to understand the DOE's assertion of exemption. Therefore, we reject the Selvidges' request for a more complete Vaughn index. (3)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Freedom of Information Act Appeal filed by Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, et al., Case Number VFA-0449, is hereby denied as set forth in paragraphs (2) and (3) below, and dismissed in all other respects.

(2) The portion of the appeal described in paragraph (1) above that concerns the adequacy of the search conducted by the DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office for documents that reveal the identity and effects of the nearly 100 ?classified' substances at Oak Ridge is hereby denied.

(3) The portion of the appeal described in paragraph (1) above that concerns the adequacy of the index describing the withheld portions of the finding aid provided in partial response to the request for the contents of the Records Holding Task Group at Oak Ridge is hereby denied.

(4) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1) In addition, they assert that a conflict of interest exists that has tainted the ability of the ORO FOIA Officer to perform her function diligently, and request that this Office have no ex parte communications with ORO personnel during our handling of this appeal. Although this Office has no authority to consider claims of conflict of interest, we have considered whether the ORO FOIA Officer's determinations to date are in compliance with the FOIA, and have determined that they are, as set forth in this Decision. With respect to ex parte communications, there are no statutory or regulatory provisions governing this proceeding that prohibit such communications. Moreover, such a prohibition has no bearing in an administrative review process, such as this one, that is not of a quasi-judicial nature. Compare 10 C.F.R. §§ 708.9(c), 710.26(a) (prohibiting ex parte discussions in whistleblower and personnel security proceedings, respectively).

(2) Appellate review of the withholding of information from the RHTG database printout under Exemptions 1 and 3 has been assigned Case Number VFA-0451.

(3) We note that the index also indicates that certain pages of the printout will be provided after ORO receives advice it has sought from other agencies or other DOE offices. No information has yet been withheld under these conditions. The appellants may await further communication from ORO and appeal any information that might be withheld upon notice of such withholding, or may seek recourse at the present time in the Federal courts.

Case No. VFA-0450, 27 DOE ¶ 80,169

November 10, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Frank E. Isbill

Date of Filing: October 14, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0450

On October 14, 1998, Frank E. Isbill, the Appellant, filed an Appeal from a final determination that the Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued on September 11, 1998. In its determination, OR granted in part a request for information that the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

BACKGROUND

In a letter dated June 9, 1998 (Request), the Appellant submitted a FOIA Request to DOE Headquarters (DOE/HQ) in Washington, D.C., for the following five categories of documents:

1. Records pertaining to the Appellant's complaint to the DOE's Office of Inspector General (OIG) about fraud and mismanagement at the DOE's Office of Scientific and Technical Information (OSTI) at Oak Ridge, Tennessee, including all information located at Oak Ridge and Washington, D.C. Also requested was information located at the DOE's Office of Employee Concerns at both locations and documents in the files of NCI Information Systems (NCI) at its Oak Ridge and Washington, DC, offices. The Appellant specifically named eight DOE employees and two NCI employees as individuals who might possess responsive documents.
2. Records pertaining to the handling of complaints of fraud, mismanagement and reprisals at OSTI from the Office of the Director of OSTI and the Office of the Secretary of Energy.
3. Copies of memoranda, directives, electronic messages (e-mail) and all other records with regard to the Appellant's performance, veteran status, promotions or salary from the files of DOE, NCI or Labat Incorporated (Labat).(1)
4. Copies of memoranda, directives, electronic messages (e-mail) and all other records from the files of OSTI or the Office of Personnel at OR with regard to the Appellant's application for employment by the DOE.
5. Copies of memoranda, directives, electronic messages (e-mail) and all other records from the files of OSTI or the Office of Personnel at OR with regard to any applications for employment by Labat or NCI personnel for employment by the DOE.

DOE/HQ forwarded the Appellant's request to OR for a determination regarding documents held at OR. (2) OR, in a September 11, 1998 determination letter, released a number of documents to the Appellant. (3)

In his Appeal, the Appellant challenges the extent of the search which was conducted for responsive documents. Specifically, the Appellant claims that, based upon the documents provided to him, OR failed to search records at OSTI and that OR did not provide any documents responsive to categories 1 and 2 of his Request.

ANALYSIS

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Consequently, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. NSA, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979). In the present case, to evaluate the adequacy of OR's search, we must review two issues: the reasonableness of OR's search and the correctness of OR's determination that responsive records, if any, possessed by Labat and NCI are not agency records.

We contacted the officials at OR and OSTI to inquire as to the nature of their search for responsive documents at OR and at OSTI. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Linda Chapman, OR and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (October 21, 1998); Memorandum of telephone conversation between Lowell Langford, OSTI, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (October 21, 1998). The OR official informed us that OR searched in the offices most likely to contain responsive documents, specifically OR's personnel office, Personnel Clearance and Assurance Branch offices, the Office of Diversity Programs and Employee Concerns and the office of OR's Evaluation and Control Division. All responsive documents that were located were provided to the Appellant.

OSTI conducted a search of the files at its Resource Management Office, which is the personnel office at OSTI. Additionally, a search was made for responsive documents by searching for documents in the Office of the Director of OSTI, Walter Warnick, as well as in the offices of Chuck Morgan, Ken Williams and Brian Hitson, all of whom were named in the Appellant's Request. Mr. Hitson then inquired of the remaining DOE employees named in the Appellant's Request to determine if they were in possession of responsive documents. All responsive documents that were located were then provided to the Appellant.

From the above facts, it appears that OR conducted a search reasonably calculated to find responsive documents in its possession. All the OR and OSTI offices that were thought to possess responsive documents were searched and officials at OR and OSTI made inquires to each of the DOE personnel named in the Appellant's Request.

To complete our review of the adequacy of the search made for responsive documents, we must now consider whether responsive documents that might be possessed by NCI or Labat are "agency records" under the criteria set out by the federal courts and whether records that do not meet these criteria are nonetheless subject to release under the DOE regulations. (4)10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that any responsive documents that NCI and Labat possess are not "agency records" and that they are also not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis the courts have fashioned for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as NCI or Labat, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., Air-Con, Inc., 27 DOE ¶ 80,136 (1998) (Air-Con). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Air-Con, 27 DOE at 80,582.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The Supreme Court has held that an entity will not be considered a federal agency for purposes of the FOIA unless its operations are subject to "extensive, detailed, and virtually day-to-day supervision." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 & n. 11 (1980) (citing United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976)). In the present case, DOE did not supervise Labat's day-to-day operations during its contractual relationship with Labat. We therefore conclude that Labat is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA. With regard to NCI, DOE does not supervise NCI's day-to-day operations. Consequently, we find that NCI is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

Although neither NCI or Labat is an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, their records relevant to the Appellant's request could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time the Appellant made its FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989). In this case, none of the potentially responsive documents was in the DOE's control or possession at the time of the Appellant's request. Based on these facts, any responsive documents possessed by NCI or Labat clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46.

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). There was no DOE records ownership provision in the DOE-Labat contract. However, the DOE-NCI contract contains the following provisions regarding record ownership:

H 19. Ownership of Records

(a) Government Records. Except as provided in (b) below, all records generated under this contract shall be the property of the Government . . .

(b) Contractor's Records. The following records are the property of the Contractor and not within the scope of Paragraph (a) above:

(1) Personnel records and files maintained on individual employees and applicants;

. . . .

(4) Employee relations records and files such as records and files pertaining to:

(i) Qualifications or suitability for employment of any employee, applicant or former employee;

(ii) Allegations, investigation, and resolution of employee misconduct;

(iii) Employee discipline;

(iv) Employee charges of discrimination;

. . . .

(5) Records and files pertaining to wages, salaries, and benefits and wage, salary, and benefit administration. . . .

Section H 19, DOE Contract No. DE-AC05-95MA40110. The types of records requested by the Appellant in his Request are defined by Section H 19 of the DOE-NCI contract as belonging to NCI. Consequently, the DOE policy on contractor records described by 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1) does not mandate release of such documents to the public.

To summarize, we believe that OR's search was reasonably calculated to discover responsive documents. OSTI and OR searched the offices that were believed most likely to possess responsive documents. Additionally, each of the DOE employees named in the Request were contacted to discover if they had responsive documents. All discovered responsive documents were disclosed to the Appellant. While NCI or Labat (or the two named NCI employees) might possess responsive documents, such documents are not subject to the FOIA or to the DOE policy on contractor records described in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1). Because we find that OR's search was adequate, the Appellant's submission will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Frank E. Isbill on October 14, 1998, Case No. VFA-0450, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

(1)NCI is the contractor which provides support services for OSTI. Labat was the predecessor contractor to NCI. The Appellant was employed by both firms at OSTI.

(2)We have been informed that DOE/HQ and OIG will issue a separate determinations regarding whether they possess any responsive documents, including any documents discovered in OIG offices at Oak Ridge. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Tanya Woods, HQ, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (October 26, 1998).

(3)Portions of some documents were withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 of the FOIA. Exemption 6 protects contents of personnel, medical and similar files. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The Appellant does not challenge OR's determination regarding the material withheld pursuant to Exemption 6.

(4)For the purposes of this analysis, we will assume that NCI and Labat possess documents responsive to the Appellant's Request.

Case No. VFA-0451, 27 DOE ¶ 80,262

March 3, 2000

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioners:Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, et al.

Date of Filing: October 16, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0451

Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, Charles Selvidge and Sam Selvidge (appellants) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (ORO) issued on September 1, 1998. The determination responded to a request for information that the appellants filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The appellants challenge ORO's failure to declassify documents. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the information that it withheld as classified in its September 1, 1998 determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On September 22, 1997, the appellants requested from the DOE all documents concerning five specified categories of information and requested that the responsive documents be declassified, if necessary, before their release. The requested information concerned Oak Ridge National Laboratory's Molten Salt Reactor, the identity of "classified" substances, and the Records Holding Task Group (RHTG). This Appeal only deals with the review of the withholding under FOIA Exemptions 1 and 3 of information from the RHTG database printout. Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, 27 DOE ¶ 80,170, at 80,675 n.2 (1998). ORO had determined some of the redacted information was required to be withheld from disclosure as classified pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA. It also determined that some of the withheld information was classified, the release of which could cause damage to the national security, and therefore should be withheld under Exemption 1.

The present Appeal seeks the disclosure of the withheld portions of the requested documents. In their Appeal, the appellants contend that the withheld information should be released because there is a medical reason to know the information and it is in the public interest to release it.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990). Among the types of information of which dissemination is prohibited under the Atomic Energy Act are Restricted Data and Unclassified Controlled Nuclear Information (UCNI). 42 U.S.C. §§ 2162, 2168.

The Director of Security Affairs (SA) has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of SA reviewed again the RHTG database based upon current classification guidance. This review identified Restricted Data and UCNI that must remain protected. The Director has affirmed that all of the information being withheld as Restricted Data is related to special nuclear material production and nuclear weapons design. The Unclassified Controlled Nuclear Information being withheld from the documents concerns sensitive facilities at Oak Ridge used for the production of Special Nuclear Material. The Director also found that none of the information that continues to be properly withheld is subject to Exemption 1 of the FOIA, and determined that some information previously withheld may now be released.

Based on the review performed by the Director of SA, we have determined that the Atomic Energy Act requires the continued withholding of much of those portions of the document that the DOE previously identified as containing classified information. Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information, nevertheless such consideration is not permitted where, as in the application of Exemption 3, the disclosure is prohibited by statute. Therefore, those portions of the documents that the Director of SA has now determined to be properly classified must be withheld from disclosure. However, because some previously deleted information may now be released as a result of the Director of SA's review, a newly redacted version of the requested document will be provided to the appellants under separate cover. Accordingly, the appellants' Appeal will be granted in part and denied in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, Charles Selvidge, and Sam Selvidge, on October 16, 1998, Case No. VFA-0451, is hereby granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) A newly redacted version of the Records Holding Task Group database, in which additional information is released, will be provided to Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, Charles Selvidge, and Sam Selvidge.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Ashok Kaushal

Date of Filing: October 19, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0452

On October 19, 1998, Ashok Kaushal filed an Appeal from a determination issued on October 6, 1998, by the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (DOE/AL). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Parts 1004 and 1008.

I. Background

On April 28, 1997, Mr. Kaushal requested, under the FOIA and Privacy Act, information related to a whistleblower complaint he filed against Sandia National Laboratories (SNL). Specifically, Mr. Kaushal sought

(a) a copy of the investigation report and all documents, memoranda, letters, data, [that] has been collected by DOE/ [Office of Contractor Employee Protection] office regarding this matter; (b) a copy of response filed by Sandia National Labs; (c) a copy of the audit report prepared by Martin Marietta Corporation auditors; (d) a copy of the documents indicating [Sandia] Auditing Department costs in compiling this information; (e) a copy of the documents identifying legal costs incurred by [Sandia] including costs paid to Bob Bosser, Martin Marietta auditors; (f) a copy of documents identifying legal costs incurred by [Sandia] Legal Department and outside legal staff; (g) a copy of documents identifying other legal costs incurred pertaining to my [whistleblower complaint] and . . . my complaint filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Letter from Ashok Kaushal to GayLa Sessoms, DOE (April 23, 1997). In addition, Mr. Kaushal asked the DOE to "identify the Privacy Act system of records that contain this information." Id. Mr. Kaushal's request, which was sent to the Freedom of Information and Privacy Act Office at DOE Headquarters, was referred to the DOE's Office of Inspector General and DOE/AL. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Carolyn Becknell, DOE/AL, and Steve Goering, OHA (October

DOE/AL issued a determination on October 6, 1998, in which it released 26 records in their entirety in response to item (a) of the Mr. Kaushal's request, released two records with information deleted that DOE/AL found was exempt from release under the FOIA in response to items (b) and (c) of the request, and stated "in reference to portions (d) through (g) of your request, no records exist because the costs are not tracked separately because these legal costs are included in the cost of doing business. Therefore, there are no responsive records to these portions of your request." Letter from David L. Geary, DOE/AL, to Ashok Kaushal (October 6, 1998). Finally, DOE/AL informed Mr. Kaushal that in "reference to identifying the Privacy Act System of Records (SOR) that contain this information, none of the responsive records are indexed by a SOR." Id. (1)

On October 19, 1998, Mr. Kaushal filed the present appeal, stating, "This is to respond to a letter of October 6, 1998. I file an appeal and seek the information, which you have denied me." Appeal at 1. Mr. Kaushal then listed in his Appeal the information he is seeking by essentially restating items (a), (e), and (f) from his April 23, 1997 request. Id. Because the appellant specifically stated which items of his request are the subject of his appeal, this decision will only address DOE/AL's response to items (a), (e), and (f) of Mr. Kaushal's request.

II. Analysis

A. Item (a) of the Appellant's Request

As noted above, DOE/AL released to Mr. Kaushal 26 records in their entirety responsive to his request for "a copy of the investigation report and all documents, memoranda, letters, data, [that] has been collected by DOE/ [Office of Contractor Employee Protection] office regarding this matter." In addition, DOE/AL stated in its determination,

In reference to the portion of (a) referencing the investigation report, [DOE/AL's Management Review Division, the DOE's Kirtland Area Office], and the Sandia National Laboratories (SNL) do not have in their possession a copy of the requested investigation report prepared by the DOE Office of Contractor Employee Protection. Therefore, no responsive record is provided. This portion will be responded to by the [Office of Inspector General (OIG) at DOE Headquarters] in Washington, D.C. [DOE/AL] has discussed this portion with the OIG and they will correspond directly with you.

Though the appellant does not state specifically in his appeal what information responsive to Item (a) of his request he is being denied by DOE/AL, the only responsive document identified by DOE/AL that was not provided to Mr. Kaushal is the investigation report prepared by the Office of Contractor Employee Protection (OCEP). However, DOE/AL has informed Mr. Kaushal that he will be receiving a response to his request for the investigation report from the OIG.

Section 1004.8(a) of the DOE Regulations states that the OHA has jurisdiction to consider Freedom of Information Act Appeals "[w]hen the Authorizing Officer has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request . . . or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a). Because the OIG is responsible for issuing a determination in response to the appellant's request for the investigation report, and because the OIG has not yet issued its determination, the DOE has not denied the Appellant's request for the investigation report. After the OIG has responded to Mr. Kaushal's request, he will have the right to file an appeal of the withholding of any records responsive to item (a) of his request. In addition, after receiving the OIG's determination, Mr. Kaushal can appeal the adequacy of the DOE's (both DOE/AL's and the OIG's) search for responsive documents. At this point, however, the DOE's response to item (a) of the Appellant's request is beyond the scope of our jurisdiction and the present Appeal.

B. Items (e) and (f) of the Appellant's Request

In items (e) and (f) of his request, the appellant sought "a copy of the documents identifying legal costs incurred by [Sandia] including costs paid to Bob Bosser, Martin Marietta auditors" and "a copy of documents identifying legal costs incurred by [Sandia] Legal Department and outside legal staff." Letter from Ashok Kaushal to GayLa Sessoms, DOE (April 23, 1997). The costs to which the Appellant's letter refers are those incurred in responding to the whistleblower and EEO complaints he filed against SNL. DOE/AL responded that “no records exist because the costs are not tracked separately because these legal costs are included in the cost of doing business. Therefore, there are no responsive records to these portions of your request.”

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

After receiving Mr. Kaushal’s Appeal, we contacted DOE/AL to obtain additional information regarding its search for documents responsive to items (e) and (f) of the appellant’s request. DOE/AL informed us that it consulted SNL and learned that SNL had reached a settlement agreement regarding Mr. Kaushal’s complaints, and that the entire matter was handled by in-house counsel for SNL. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Carolyn Becknell, DOE/AL, and Steven Goering, OHA (October 22, 1998). As such, SNL states that it maintained no separate accounting of its costs related to this case. Id. We find that DOE/AL took steps reasonably calculated to uncover the documents sought by the appellant. Beyond contacting the appropriate personnel at SNL and finding out why no documents such as those sought by Mr. Kaushal would have been created by SNL, we cannot imagine what other reasonable steps DOE/AL could have taken in response to the appellant’s request. We therefore will deny the present Appeal.

(1) As implied by the issues raised in Mr. Blanco’s Appeal, the Privacy Act also imposes certain requirements on government agencies in their use of personal information, including limitations on disclosure to third parties. However, the appeal authority of the OHA under the DOE Privacy Act regulations extends only to the review of determinations issued in response to requests by individuals for access to records or amendment of records. 10 C.F.R. § 1008.11(a). Moreover, in Mr. Blanco’s original request to BPA, he did not seek to amend records, but rather requested only access to records under the Privacy Act. Thus, only the first issue raised by Mr. Blanco, relating to his right to access particular records, is within the scope of the present Appeal.

Case No. VFA-0453, 27 DOE ¶ 80,173

November 17, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Ruth Towle Murphy

Date of Filing: October 19, 1998

Case Numbers: VFA-0453

Ruth Towle Murphy files this Appeal pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy at 10 C.F.R. § 1004.

Murphy filed a FOIA request with the Department's Office of Scientific and Technical Information (OSTI) in Oak Ridge, Tennessee.(1) In her request, Murphy sought material dealing with health and safety issues at OSTI. In addition, she asked for a waiver of fees for finding and duplicating the requested materials.

Lowell Langford, the Freedom of Information Officer at OSTI, initially responded to Murphy in a letter dated September 18, 1998. Langford stated that her request "does not meet the necessary criteria" for a fee waiver set out at 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8), but gave her until October 9 to provide more information. On October 9, Langford sent Murphy his final response, informing her that "our decision to … deny a fee waiver for providing the information requested stands." Murphy now appeals the denial of her request for a fee waiver. Because we find that Murphy failed to show her eligibility for a fee waiver, we will deny the Appeal.

The FOIA generally requires that requesters pay fees for the processing of their requests. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(i); see also 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a). However, it provides a two-pronged test for agencies to use in considering whether to waive the fees. The two prongs can be summarized as the "public interest" prong and the "commercial interest" prong. The public interest prong requires an examination of whether disclosure of the information is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government. The commercial interest prong asks whether the request is primarily in the commercial interest of the requester. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(A)(iii).

The burden of satisfying the two-prong test for a fee waiver is on the requester. Larson v. CIA, 843 F.2d 1481, 1483 (D.C. Cir. 1988);International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 26 DOE ¶ 80,153 (1997) (IBEW).

In order to determine whether the requester meets the first prong - that is, whether disclosure of the requested information is in the public interest because it is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of government operations or activities - the Department considers the four factors listed below.

(A) The subject of the request: Whether the subject of the requested records concerns the operations or activities of the government.

(B) The informative value of the information to be disclosed: Whether the disclosure is likely to contribute to an understanding of government operations or activities.

(C) The contribution to an understanding by the general public of the subject likely to result from disclosure.

(D) The significance of the contribution to public understanding: Whether the disclosure is likely to contribute significantly to public understanding of government operations or activities.

10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(i). A requester who satisfies the four factors of the public interest prong must then address the second prong by showing that disclosure of the information is not primarily in his or her commercial interest.

Although OSTI did not explain why it denied Murphy's request for a fee waiver, we find Factor C - whether the disclosure contributes to the understanding of the general public - to be determinative in this case. In considering whether the requester satisfies this factor, the relevant inquiry is whether he or she will disseminate the disclosed records to a reasonably broad audience of persons interested in the subject. Carney v. Department of Justice, 19 F.3d 807, 814 (2d Cir. 1994) (Carney). To meet this test, the requester must have the intention and ability to disseminate this information to the public. IBEW, 26 DOE at 80,671; James L. Schwab, 22 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1992). The inability to disseminate information, by itself, is sufficient basis for denying a fee waiver request. Larson v. CIA, 843 F.2d 1481, 1483 (D.C. Cir. 1988).

Murphy stated in her appeal that she is a doctoral student at the University of Tennessee. She said that the information she is requesting is for research on her dissertation, and "will be offered to the general public at no cost." She provides no explanation, however, of how her dissertation will be disseminated to a reasonably broad academic audience, as required in Carney.

The courts have looked closely at a requester's ability to broadly disseminate the requested information. For example, a researcher sought a fee waiver based on his statement that "I am an instructor and researcher employed by Middle Tennessee State University, and intend to use the information I am requesting as the basis for a planned book." Burriss v. CIA, 524 F. Supp. 448, 449 (M.D. Tenn. 1981). The court upheld the agency's denial of a fee waiver request based on its finding that the requester's statements had not demonstrated his ability to effectively disseminate the information to the public. Similarly, a requester's intention to merely place the requested information in a library is insufficient, in itself, to establish public dissemination for the purpose of obtaining a fee waiver. Klamath Water Users Protective Ass'n v. Department of the Interior, No. 96-3077, slip op. at 47 (D. Or. June 19, 1997) (magistrate's recommendation), adopted (D. Or. Oct. 16, 1997) (appeal pending).

Although the requester must disseminate the disclosed information to the public to obtain a fee waiver, the information need not reach a broad cross-section of the public. As the court explained in Carney:

The [agency] suggests that, because [the requester's] dissertation and proposed articles and book ... are scholarly in nature, they will not reach a general audience and hence will not benefit the public at large. Such work by its nature usually will not reach a general audience, but, by enlightening interested scholars, it often is of great benefit to the public at large.... The relevant inquiry, as we see it, is whether the requester will disseminate the disclosed records to a reasonably broad audience of persons interested in the subject.

From the information he submitted to the [agency], we are satisfied that [the requester] will disseminate the disclosed records to a sufficiently broad audience of students and academics interested in his work.... While it is true that [the requester's] book is only tentative, the fact that he is working on a related dissertation is sufficient evidence, for purposes of the public interest fee waiver, to conclude that his book will be completed.

Carney 19 F.3d at 815.

While it is clear that the dissemination requirement may be met by disclosing the information to a community of scholars, we do not find that Murphy has met this standard. Murphy has provided us with no evidence of her ability to disseminate the information to a sufficiently broad audience, and she has thus failed to meet the requirements for a fee waiver for this request. We will therefore deny this Appeal. (2)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Ruth Towle Murphy, Case No. VFA-0453, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review. Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1) 1/ Murphy filed nine separate FOIA requests between August 31 and September 15, 1998, all dealing with health and safety at OSTI. The FOIA office at OSTI aggregated the nine requests into one.

(2) 2/ Because Murphy has not met the burden of satisfying the public interest prong, we need not consider the second prong of the test - whether disclosure of the information is primarily in the commercial interest of the requester.

Case No. VFA-0454, 27 DOE ¶ 80,172

November 17, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Alan Henney

Date of Filing: October 20, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0454

On October 20, 1998, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) received a request from the Department of Commerce asking DOE to provide a direct response to part of an Appeal filed by Alan Henney under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. As detailed below, we will dismiss this Appeal because OHA lacks jurisdiction to adjudicate this matter under the DOE FOIA regulations, 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. We will also ask the FOIA/Privacy Act Division of the Office of the Executive Secretariat (DOE FOIA Office) to treat Mr. Henney's Appeal as if it were a new request for documents under the FOIA.

BACKGROUND

This Appeal involves information concerning 3,273 radio frequency authorizations assigned to DOE by the National Telecommunications and Information Administration (NTIA) of the Department of Commerce.

On February 26, 1995, Mr. Henney submitted a FOIA request to the Department of Commerce seeking a list of all unclassified NTIA radio frequency authorizations, and accompanying information fields, for each agency in the Federal government. On February 6, 1996, the Chief Counsel of the NTIA issued a determination denying Mr. Henney's request pursuant to Exemption 1 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1), because the information sought was classified as "confidential," and met the criteria established by Executive Order 12356.

On February 20, 1996, Mr. Henney appealed this determination to the Assistant General Counsel for Administration of the Department of Commerce. On September 14, 1998, in response to this Appeal, the Assistant General Counsel issued a decision that provided some records to Mr. Henney, and explained that other records had been withheld because:

[t]he remaining records . . . consist of frequency assignments that the agencies to which they are assigned have asked us not to disclose, based on one or more FOIA exemptions. Thus, we are referring your appeal to these agencies (a total of thirty-two), each of which should respond directly to you.

The Assistant General Counsel stated that, under the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), Mr. Henney had the right to seek judicial review of the partial denial of records contained in this decision, but she recommended that Mr. Henney deal separately with an agency that was withholding its frequency authorizations.

A chart was appended to the decision that showed the total number of unclassified NTIA radio frequency authorizations assigned to each federal agency, and the number of FOIA exemptions claimed by each agency. The chart showed that DOE had a total of 9,592 unclassified NTIA radio frequency assignments, and had claimed that information concerning 3,273 unclassified NTIA radio frequency assignments was exempt from disclosure under the FOIA. The Assistant General Counsel did not cite any specific exemption that provided the basis for withholding information concerning each of the 3,273 radio frequency authorizations assigned to DOE. Additionally, the Assistant General Counsel did not indicate whether she had considered and rejected a discretionary release of this information, or whether there was any segregable, nonexempt information in the withheld records that she could have disclosed. Finally, the Assistant General Counsel never identified the DOE official who had requested that the documents be withheld under an exemption to the FOIA.

ANALYSIS

Under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a) of the DOE regulations, OHA does not have jurisdiction to adjudicate this matter because there is no evidence that the decision to withhold documents in response to Mr. Henney's FOIA request was made by a DOE officer who has custody or responsibility for these records under the FOIA. Moreover, under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b), a legally sufficient denial of records under the FOIA has not been issued.

OHA's appellate jurisdiction under the FOIA is based on DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Section 1004.8(a) of the DOE regulations gives OHA jurisdiction over matters arising under the FOIA only in the following circumstances:

When the Authorizing Officer (1) has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request . . . or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees.

OHA has consistently held that Section 1004.8(a) must be strictly construed, and does not confer jurisdiction upon OHA when the requester has not received an initial denial or a statement that there are no documents responsive to the request from an Authorizing Official. See John H. Hnatio, 13 DOE ¶ 80,119 at 80,566 (1985) (dismissing appeal because no determination issued); see also Suffolk County, 17 DOE ¶ 80,111 at 80,524 (1988) (dismissing appeal because OHA lacks jurisdiction over matters not explicitly set forth in jurisdictional regulation); Tulsa Tribune, 11 DOE ¶ 80,161 at 80,741 (1984) (without explicit statutory or regulatory provision, no administrative remedy exists for agency's noncompliance with a timeliness requirement). However, this Section does confer appellate jurisdiction upon OHA whenever a DOE Authorizing Official has denied records. Thus, OHA will have jurisdiction to hear an appeal based on a denial issued by another agency when the determination names a DOE Authorizing Official as the individual responsible for a denial of records. Cf. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(f)(2) (regulation involves denial of FOIA request by DOE at the behest of another agency, and requires that the other agency's denying official be identified).

OHA cannot review the denial of records by the Assistant General Counsel for Administration of the Department of Commerce because there is no evidence, aside from a very general statement in the February 20, 1996 letter quoted earlier, that a DOE Authorizing Officer determined that these records should be withheld. The Assistant General Counsel's generalized assumption that the Department of Commerce was withholding the information Mr. Henney seeks from DOE because DOE claimed that the withheld records are exempt from disclosure under the FOIA is not sufficient to consider this appeal. To confer jurisdiction upon OHA, the Assistant General Counsel should have identified the DOE official who made the determination to withhold these documents.

Moreover, the decision issued by the Assistant General Counsel is not a legally sufficient denial of documents under the DOE regulations because it does not contain other information required by 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7. Section 1004.7 requires, in relevant part, that each denial under the FOIA contain:

(1) A specific statement of the reason for the denial. The determination must refer to the FOIA exemption that justifies the non- disclosure of the information, provide an explanation of the reason that the exemption applies to the record withheld, and explain the reason that a discretionary release is not appropriate.

(2) A statement that identifies each DOE official who is responsible for the determination.

(3) A statement addressing the issue of segregable nonexempt material in the documents that have been denied.

(4) A statement that the determination may be appealed within thirty calendar days to the Office of Hearings and Appeals.

The information required by Section 1004.7 enables a requester to decide whether the agency's response to its FOIA request was adequate and proper, and also provides OHA with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal. Without an adequately informative determination letter, the requester and the review authority must speculate about the adequacy and appropriateness of the agency's determinations. Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,205 at 80,767 (1996).

The decision issued by the Assistant General Counsel is inadequate under the DOE regulations. First, as previously set forth, it failed to identify the DOE Official who determined that information relating to certain radio frequency authorizations assigned to DOE was exempt from disclosure. Moreover, it failed to specify the FOIA exemption that was applicable to each withheld record, to indicate whether segregable, nonexempt material in the withheld records had been released, or to inform Mr. Henney of his right to appeal to OHA. Usually, OHA will remand an insufficient determination to the Authorizing Official who issued it to correct the inadequacy. Here, however, the insufficiency of the determination rises to the level of a jurisdictional defect because an Authorizing Official is not identified, and the decision contains very little of the information required by Section 1004.7.

Neither Congress nor any administrative agency has empowered OHA to adjudicate an issue under the FOIA unless a DOE Authorizing Official has first denied the release of the requested documents. Because no DOE Authorizing Official is responsible for the denial of information, the Department of Commerce's response to Mr. Henney's FOIA Appeal does not contain a denial that OHA may review. Accordingly, OHA lacks jurisdiction to decide whether the information concerning the 3,273 radio frequency authorizations assigned to DOE was properly withheld by the Department of Commerce under an exemption to the FOIA. Accordingly, we must dismiss this Appeal.

We will forward Mr. Henney's submission to the DOE FOIA Office with a request that it treat Mr. Henney's Appeal as if it were a new request under the FOIA. A DOE Authorizing Official will then determine whether these documents should be provided to Mr. Henney. If the DOE Authorizing Official determines that any of these records are exempt from disclosure under the FOIA, the denial should refer to the FOIA exemption that justifies each non- disclosure of the information, provide an explanation of the reason that the exemption applies to the record withheld, and explain the reason that a discretionary release is not appropriate. Moreover, the DOE Authorizing Official should release to Mr. Henney all segregable nonexempt information contained in the records. Based on this information, Mr. Henney will be able to decide whether DOE's response to his FOIA request is adequate, and OHA will have a full explanation of the agency's action, should Mr. Henney chose to appeal the determination.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal of Alan Henney received by the Office of Hearings and Appeals on October 20, 1998, is hereby dismissed.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0455, 27 DOE ¶ 80,174

December 3, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Douglas Farver

Date of Filing: October 20, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0455

This Decision and Order concerns an Appeal that was filed by Douglas Farver from a determination issued to him by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Oak Ridge Operations Office (Oak Ridge). In this determination, Oak Ridge granted in part a request for information that Mr. Farver filed pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. However, Oak Ridge declined to process a portion of the request, finding that it did not "reasonably describe" the records sought, as is required under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(c)(1). In his appeal, Mr. Farver contests this finding, and asks that we order the production of any additional responsive documents.

I. Background

In his FOIA request, Mr. Farver sought access to nine specified categories of documents pertaining to the procurement, use and disposal of acetonitrile (also known as methyl cyanide) at the Y-12 plant and the East Tennessee Technology Park (ETTP). In response to this request, Oak Ridge issued a partial determination on February 2, 1998 and a final determination on September 14, 1998. In these determinations, Oak Ridge provided a number of documents responsive to items 1, 4, 5, 6 and 8 of the request, and stated that no documents responsive to item 9 (documents describing accident scenarios involving acetonitrile at the Y-12 plant) could be located. With regard to items 7(a) through 7(g), Oak Ridge stated that processing this portion of the request would require in excess of several hundred hours of effort....Furthermore, the agency would not normally undertake this magnitude of effort in the normal course of day to day operations at the Y-12 Plant. Therefore, because of the extraordinary amount of time, funds, and personnel involvement in such an undertaking, we consider the scope of your item 7 as currently written too broad and cumbersome to process under the FOIA at this time.

September 14, 1998 determination letter at 1.(1) Oak Ridge did not respond to items 2 and 3 of Mr. Farver's request in either determination. In his appeal, Mr. Farver contends that Oak Ridge has not adequately justified its refusal to process item 7 of the request.(2)

II. Analysis

We have carefully reviewed the record in this matter, including all of the arguments raised in Mr. Farver's appeal, and Oak Ridge's responses to those arguments. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that Oak Ridge has not adequately justified its finding that item 7 does not "reasonably describe" the records sought, and that the determination issued to Mr. Farver was inadequate. We will therefore remand this matter to Oak Ridge for the issuance of a new determination letter.

A. Adequacy of the Request

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Under the FOIA, such a request must "reasonably describe" the records sought. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3)(A). This requirement is met if the request enables the DOE "to identify and locate the records sought by a process that is not unreasonably burdensome or disruptive of DOE operations." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(c)(1). The DOE may take into consideration problems of search which are associated with the files of a particular facility and determine that a request is not one for reasonably described documents as it pertains to that facility. Id. If the request does not "reasonably describe" the records sought, the agency response must specify the reasons for this finding and invite the requester to confer with knowledgeable personnel "in an attempt to restate the request or reduce the request to manageable proportions by reformulation or by agreeing on an orderly procedure for the production of the records." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.4(c)(2). (3)

As previously stated, Oak Ridge determined that item 7 did not "reasonably describe" the records sought. In that item, Mr. Farver sought copies of all documents pertaining to the quantities and dates of use of acetonitrile in facilities associated with the Y-12 plant (7(a) through 7(g)) and facilities associated with the ETTP (7(h) through 7(l)). While Oak Ridge provided some justification for its finding that items 7(a) through 7(g) do not "reasonably describe" the records sought, it has provided no explanation for the determination letter's apparent finding that items 7(h) through 7(l) are impermissibly broad. Indeed, there is nothing in the record to indicate that processing this portion of the request would be unduly burdensome, or would disrupt the normal operation of the ETTP or any other Oak Ridge operation in any meaningful way. Therefore, on remand, Oak Ridge should either explain why items 7(h) through 7(l) do not "reasonably describe" the requested material, or process these requests by conducting a new search and informing Mr. Farver of the results of that search in a new determination letter. In addition, Oak Ridge should also provide further information as to the extent of the burden that processing items 7(a) through 7(g) would produce. This information should include as accurate an estimate as possible of the amount of material that would have to be searched for responsive documents, and the number of employees who would be available to undertake such a task.

B. Adequacy of the Determination

After conducting a search for responsive documents under the FOIA, an agency must provide a written determination notifying the requester of the results of that search, and, if applicable, of the agency's intentions to withhold any of the responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). This allows the requester to decide whether the agency's response to its request was adequate and provides this Office with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal.

As previously stated, Oak Ridge did not respond to items 2 and 3 of Mr. Farver's request. In item 2, Mr. Farver requests copies of all documents detailing the use of acetonitrile at the Y-12 plant. In item 3, he seeks copies of all such documents concerning the ETTP. Without responses to these items, it is not possible for Mr. Farver to effectively challenge Oak Ridge's handling of this portion of his request, nor does it provide us with a complete record upon which to consider his appeal. Therefore, Oak Ridge's new determination letter should specifically address items 2 and 3 of Mr. Farver's request. In this letter, Oak Ridge should describe the scope of the search for documents responsive to these items, and provide the results of that search.

C. Summary

For the reasons set forth above, we will remand this matter to Oak Ridge. On remand, Oak Ridge shall perform a new search for documents responsive to items 2, 3, and 7(h) through 7(l) of Mr. Farver's request and shall issue a new determination letter informing him of the results of that search, unless it determines that these items do not "reasonably describe" the requested documents. In that case, the determination letter should fully set forth its reasons for that finding. Oak Ridge should also provide additional support for its finding that items 7(a) through 7(g) of Mr. Farver's request are impermissibly broad.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Douglas Farver is granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Officer of the Oak Ridge Operations Office for further proceedings in accordance with the instructions set forth in this Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review. Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The letter went on to state that unless Mr. Farver narrowed the scope of item 7, or gave a written statement indicating his willingness to pay expected search and copying costs, Oak Ridge could not process that portion of his request. In his appeal, Mr. Farver interprets this statement as a rejection of his request for a fee waiver, and argues that the rejection was improper. However, the volume of documents provided to Mr. Farver did not exceed the 100 page threshold for the assessment of fees, 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(6), and Oak Ridge has stated that it did not process item 7 of the request because it considered that item to be too broad and cumbersome. September 14 determination letter. Therefore, no fee waiver determination was necessary and none was in fact made. See memorandum of November 25, 1998 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Amy Rothrock, Oak Ridge FOIA Officer.

(2)In addition, Mr. Farver argues that Oak Ridge has not conducted an adequate search for responsive documents. However, because we are remanding this matter to Oak Ridge and additional documents may therefore be provided to Mr. Farver, we will not address this arguments at this time.

(3)Oak Ridge has informed us that it did in fact confer with Mr. Farver in an attempt to narrow the scope of his request. These efforts were unsuccessful. Oak Ridge Response to Farver appeal at 5.

Case No. VFA-0456, 27 DOE ¶ 80,175

December 8, 1998

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Louella Benson

Date of Filings: November 6, 1998

Case Numbers: VFA-0456

On November 6, 1998, Louella Benson (Benson) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that the DOE Headquarters FOIA/Privacy Act Division (DOE/HQ) issued to her on October 16, 1998. The determination concerned a request for information that Benson submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, DOE/HQ would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

In a letter to the Secretary of Energy, Benson requested information regarding any DOE funds disbursed to (1) Lloyd Energy of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, or (2) Compass Bank, of Houston, Texas and/or any of their agents or associates, for any reasons, including but not limited to research and development, energy, dual-use, geophysical, environmental, or genetic operations. Letter from Benson to the Secretary of Energy (August 27, 1998). She also asked for information regarding any DOE funding for research and development projects at her properties in Virginia and Louisiana. Id. The Office of the Secretary forwarded the letter to DOE/HQ on September 14, 1998. DOE/HQ assigned the request to the Office of Energy Research (ER) and the Office of the Chief Financial Officer (CR) to conduct a search of their files. Letter from DOE/HQ to Benson (September 23, 1998). On October 2, 1998, CR sent Benson a list of DOE funds disbursed to Lloyd Energy, Compass Bank, and a school located in the same Louisiana parish as Benson's property. Letter from CR to Benson (October 2, 1998). That letter also indicated that the responsive documents included only data residing at DOE Headquarters. Id. Shortly thereafter, DOE/HQ issued a determination to Benson, stating that ER found no responsive material in its search. Letter from DOE/HQ to Benson (October 16, 1998) (Determination Letter). On November 6, 1998, Benson filed this Appeal, arguing that the responsive information that she received was not complete because it did not contain an explanation of the payments. She also questioned whether other offices may possess responsive material.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted CR and ER to ascertain the scope of both searches. DOE/HQ determined that ER would be a likely location for responsive documents, since ER is responsible for much of DOE's research. DOE/HQ also sent the request to CR, the DOE office responsible for the disbursement of funds.

Two ER offices, the Office of Resource Management (ORM) and the Office of Health and Environmental Research (OHER), had conducted searches in response to Benson's request. ORM informed us that the Grants and Contracts Division searched the Integrated Procurement System, a database of all grants and awards. No responsive material was found. OHER searched its database on city and state, and institution name. That search did not uncover any responsive material. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Bonnie Lasky, ER, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (December 1, 1998).

Capital Accounting is one of three DOE payment offices, and is the CR office responsible for headquarters payments and disbursements. Capital Accounting had searched its records in response to Benson's request and found responsive material from fiscal year 1990 through fiscal year 1998. CR promptly sent this material to Benson, along with the name of a CR employee to call with any questions about the disclosure.(1) Thus, CR fulfilled its obligation under the FOIA to provide responsive, non-exempt material to a requester. Nonetheless, after discussing the Appeal with this office, and being advised of the requester's apparent lack of understanding of the material produced, CR offered to research the payments listed in the responsive material in order to provide Benson with any non-exempt background information. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Bill Robinson, CR and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (November 30, 1998). We also contacted CR's Office of Departmental Accounting to determine if additional responsive material existed in local offices. That group agreed to ask the two remaining DOE payment offices (Albuquerque and Oak Ridge) to search for any further responsive documents. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Woodie Fisher, CR, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (December 3, 1998). A new response is forthcoming.

We find that ER and CR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover all documents related to DOE disbursements to Lloyd Energy, Compass Bank, and research projects that may exist at the requester's properties. As stated above, the FOIA does not require an exhaustive search, only a reasonable one. On the basis of the facts provided above, we conclude that ER and CR conducted a search reasonably calculated to uncover responsive documents. Accordingly, we must deny Benson's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on November 6, 1998 by Louella Benson, OHA Case No. VFA-0456, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0457, 27 DOE ¶ 80,182

January 19, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Hans M. Kristensen

Date of Filing:November 10, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0457

Hans M. Kristensen filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on October 30, 1998, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Communications and Information of the Department of the Air Force (Deputy Director). In that determination, the Deputy Director denied in part a request for information that Mr. Kristensen filed with the Air Force on December 1, 1995, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. Some of the information deleted from two documents the Air Force released to Mr. Kristensen in that determination was withheld pursuant to a review of the documents by the Office of Declassification of the Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to instruct the Deputy Director that the DOE no longer requires the classification and withholding of the information that the Air Force withheld on the DOE's behalf.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On December 1, 1995, Mr. Kristensen submitted a request under the FOIA to the Department of the Air Force for a number of documents, including two entitled "History of Strategic Air Command, Volume I, 1 July 1954-30 June 1956" and "History of Strategic Air Command, Volume I, 1 July 1956-31 December 1956." On May 28, 1996, the Air Force sent the documents to the DOE for classification review. In response to that request, the DOE advised the Air Force on June 17, 1998, that the documents contained classified information that it considered exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). On October 30, 1998, the Air Force released to Mr.

Kristensen excerpts of the two documents described above, from which it withheld the information that the DOE claimed was exempt from disclosure under the FOIA as well as other information that the Air Force claimed was exempt from disclosure.

In his Appeal to the DOE, Mr. Kristensen seeks the disclosure of those portions of the excerpts that the Air Force withheld at the request of the DOE. Mr. Kristensen contends that the information the DOE has identified as classified should be declassified and released, because "the records are nearly 50 years old" and because the public would benefit significantly from their disclosure.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990). The portions that the DOE deleted under Exemption 3 were withheld on the grounds that they contain information about nuclear weapons storage that was classified as Formerly Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure.

Upon referral of the Appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Office of Declassification again reviewed those portions of the excerpts for which the DOE had claimed exemptions from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA. That Office has now concluded that the document no longer contains any information that needs to remain classified by the DOE. The information, though no longer classified by the DOE, may still be classified by the Air Force. The DOE has advised the Air Force of its determination and the Air Force will now inform Mr. Kristensen of its own determination concerning that information. Accordingly, Mr. Kristensen's Appeal will be granted.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Hans M. Kristensen on November 10, 1998, Case No. VFA-0457, is hereby granted.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Matthew Cherney, M.D.

Date of Filing: December 9, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0459

On December 9, 1998, Matthew Cherney, M.D., filed an Appeal from determinations issued on July 24, 1998, and September 18, 1998, by the Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy (DOE/EE). The determinations responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A). However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(B). Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

Dr. Cherney requested from the DOE all documents related to an unsolicited proposal he had submitted to the DOE. The proposal concerned a system for collecting solar energy invented by Dr. Cherney. Dr. Cherney's request specified the following categories of documents relating to the proposal:

(1) All documents received by DOE and given consideration;

(2) All written comments from all evaluators (and any calculations): Dr. Allan Hoffman, Dr. Joseph Galdo, Jeff Muhs, Slo Rajic, Marc Simpson, and Anthony Schaffhauser;

(3) All comments from any other evaluators;

(4) Transcripts of any oral comments made by any evaluator;

(5) Any other documents in the file; and

(6) Any electronic communications or telephone recordings.

On July 24, 1998, DOE/EE issued a partial response to the Appellant's request in which it released copies of 26 responsive documents. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Dr. Matthew Cherney, Sunbear Systems (July 24, 1998). DOE/EE issued another partial response on September 18, 1998. In that determination, DOE/EE released an additional 35 documents in their entirety, released 4 other documents with information redacted from them, and identified 31 documents that it was withholding in their entirety. DOE/EE stated that the information it was withholding was exempt from disclosure under Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems (September 18, 1998).(1) In the latter determination, DOE/EE stated that it would issue a final response to Dr. Cherney's request after it completes its review of 35 remaining responsive documents. Id. To date, DOE/EE has not issued a final response to the request.

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are “inter-agency memoranda or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency.” 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts “those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context.” NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The three principal privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion are the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work product privilege, and the “deliberative process” privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). In the present case, DOE/EE relied upon the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5.

The deliberative process privilege shields from public disclosure records reflecting the predecisional, consultative process of an agency. Benedetto Enterprises, Inc., 19 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1989); Darci L. Rock, 13 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1985). Predecisional materials are not exempt merely because they are prepared prior to a final action, policy, or interpretation. These materials must be a part of the agency's deliberative process by which decisions are made. Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136, 1144 (D.C. Cir. 1975). This privilege was developed primarily to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making government decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939 (Cl. Ct. 1958)). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions. NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 151 (1975).

DOE/EE explained in its determination that the documents withheld were created during agency consideration of your proposal and were prepared in order to assist the agency decisionmaker in arriving at his or her decision on your proposal. They reflect the analysis, advisory opinions, deliberations and recommendations of subordinates that are part of the deliberative process leading to a final decision and comprise part of the process by which government decisions were considered. Thus these documents are prior to the adoption of a final decision and are part of a deliberative process in that they make recommendations or express opinions to decision makers. These documents are subject to further review and analysis, they discuss possible courses of action, and several versions could be used in the decision making process. They do not represent the final agency decision.

Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems (September 18, 1998) at 2.

In his Appeal, Dr. Cherney asks that we order DOE/EE to release to him all responsive documents. Letter from Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems, to Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) (November 17, 1998) (Appeal Letter 1). First, the Appellant contends that the 35 documents currently being reviewed by DOE/EE “fit no conceivable exemption” and should be released. Id. at 1. Regarding the documents that DOE/EE has withheld under FOIA Exemption 5, Dr. Cherney argues that material withheld under this exemption should be released because it “is, by definition, available in a lawsuit anyway.” Id. The appellant also questions when an “actual decision” was made on his proposal. Id. at 2. He notes that information he has indicates that a decision was made “circa January 9" of 1998, and that therefore any documents created after that date are not "predecisional." Id.

In addition, Dr. Cherney states in some detail why he is seeking the documents in question. Appeal Letter 1; Letter from Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems, to Steven J. Goering, OHA (November 30, 1998) (Appeal Letter 2). Not surprisingly, the Appellant would like to have a complete understanding of why the DOE did not accept his proposal. Thus, he wants to know why those who reviewed his proposal arrived at their conclusions and what standards were used in the review, so that he and his company can "respond intelligently." Appeal Letter 2 at 1-2; Appeal Letter 1 at 1. He also wants to find out whether the DOE's decision was based on scientific criteria or "legal/political" reasons. Appeal Letter 2 at 5; Addendum to Appeal Letter 1 at 2. Finally, the Appellant contends that the documents being withheld will show that his company proceeded in "maximal good faith." Addendum to Appeal Letter 1 at 2.

II. Analysis

A. Documents Currently Being Reviewed by DOE/EE

As noted above, DOE/EE is currently reviewing 35 remaining documents responsive to Dr. Cherney's request, and thus has not yet issued a final determination in response to the request. Section 1004.8(a) of the DOE Regulations states that the OHA has jurisdiction to consider Freedom of Information Act Appeals "[w]hen the Authorizing Officer has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request . . . or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a). Because DOE/EE has not yet issued a determination with respect to the remaining responsive documents, the DOE has not denied the Appellant's request as to these documents. Thus, there is no determination with respect to the remaining documents that can appealed to this office. After DOE/EE has issued a determination regarding those documents, Dr. Cherney will have the right to file an appeal of any withholding. In addition, after receiving the DOE/EE's final determination in response to his request, Dr. Cherney can appeal the adequacy of the DOE/EE's search for responsive documents.

The Appellant has asked whether we nonetheless could at this point consider the lack of a final determination from DOE/EE a constructive denial of his request that could be appealed to the OHA. Memorandum of telephone conversation between Matthew Cherney, M.D., and Steven Goering, OHA (December 22, 1998). We have previously considered an argument that a request to which there has been no response constitutes a constructive denial appealable to the OHA. We held there, as we do here, that we have "no jurisdiction to consider an Appeal until a determination is issued by a DOE office." U.S. Solar Roof, 26 DOE ¶ 80,102 at 80,505 (1996). The Appellant, however, does have the right to file a complaint, based on the DOE's failure to issue a final response to his request within the prescribed time period, with the appropriate federal district court. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), 6(C).

B. Documents Withheld by DOE/EE Under FOIA Exemption 5

Before we address specifically the documents withheld by DOE/EE, we will consider generally three points raised by Dr. Cherney in his Appeal. First, we note above that the Appellant has provided a number of reasons why he seeks the documents he has requested. However, a requester need not justify or explain why he needs documents in order to obtain them under the FOIA. Regardless of the identity or particular needs of a requester, the FOIA presumptively mandates that documents requested be released. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A). Only if information is specifically exempt from disclosure may an agency withhold documents in response to a FOIA request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(B). In addition, as we discuss below, the DOE will discretionarily release information exempt from the FOIA if disclosure is not contrary to federal law and is in the public interest. However, the particular interest of a requester in the information he seeks has no bearing on our determination as to whether information should be released under the FOIA or DOE regulations.

Second, Dr. Cherney contends that even if the information withheld is protected by Exemption 5, it should be released because it "is, by definition, available in a lawsuit anyway." Appeal Letter 1 at 1. This contention is not correct. To the contrary, FOIA Exemption 5 protects "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party . . . in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5) (emphasis added).

Third, the Appellant argues that, although he received a letter from DOE dated March 23, 1998, stating that the DOE would not fund his proposal, there is information indicating that the actual decision on his proposal was made prior to that date. The date of the agency decision is significant in that it can help determine whether materials were prepared prior to a final action, policy, or interpretation, and therefore are predecisional. We have reviewed the documents withheld from the appellant and the letters sent to him on March 23, 1998, and we conclude that none of these documents evidences an agency decision on Dr. Cherney's proposal prior to March 23, 1998. Though the materials indicate that certain technical evaluations of the proposal were completed prior to this date, it is clear that the only DOE official empowered to decide whether the agency would fund the proposal was the Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy. As late as March 23, 1998, the date of this DOE official's letter to Dr. Cherney, technical evaluations, comments, and recommendations regarding the proposal were provided to the official by and on behalf of his subordinates, and these recommendations are cited by the DOE official in his letter to the Appellant. Thus, we conclude that materials prepared on or prior to March 23, 1998, are predecisional.

1. Documents Responsive to Item 1 of the Appellant's Request

In its September 18, 1998 determination, DOE/EE withheld three documents in part under FOIA Exemption 5 in response to the Appellant's request for "all documents received by DOE and given consideration" with regard to his proposal. The documents from which information was withheld were submitted to the DOE by the Appellant's company as part of its proposal. Withheld from the document are handwritten notes of DOE personnel who were evaluating the proposal. We find that these notations clearly reflect the mental processes of the evaluators prior to the agency's decision on the Appellant's proposal, and thus are precisely the kind of information intended to be shielded by Exemption 5. See Montrose Chem. Corp. v. Train, 491 F.2d 63, 70 (D.C. Cir. 1974) ("[T]he purpose of exemption 5 is not simply to encourage frank intra-agency discussion of policy, but also to ensure that the mental processes of decision-makers are not subject to public scrutiny.").

2. Documents Responsive to Item 2 of the Appellant's Request

In response to Dr. Cherney's request for "[a]ll written comments from all evaluators (and any calculations)," DOE/EE withheld one document in part and 13 other documents in their entirety under Exemption 5. Each of these documents contains the analysis of the agency personnel who evaluated the Appellant's proposal. This analysis was obviously done as part of the agency's deliberative process by which it ultimately decided whether to fund the proposal. Thus, DOE/EE properly withheld material contained in these documents.

However, the FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (1982). See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 89, 91 (1973); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Air Force, 556 F.2d 242, 259-62 (D.C. Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 927 (1978); Casson, Calligaro & Mutryn, 10 DOE ¶ 80,137 at 80,615 (1983). Segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary where it is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material so that release of the non-exempt material would "compromise" the withheld material, or where the amount of non-exempt material is small and so interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate, Lead Indus. Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 83-86 (2d Cir. 1979). We therefore must determine whether DOE/EE should segregate and release any of the material it withheld from the Appellant.

We have reviewed the documents in question and find that non-exempt material in certain of the documents can be released to Dr. Cherney without compromising the material withheld or imposing an inordinate burden on DOE/EE. First, in the one-page memorandum from A.C. Schaffhauser withheld in its entirety and labeled "#7," the sentences that are deliberative in nature can easily be redacted from the document. Similar redactions can be made in the one-page memorandum addressed to T. Schaffhauser labeled "#8." The remaining portions of these documents may not be withheld from the Appellant under FOIA Exemption 5. With respect to the other documents withheld in response to this item of Dr. Cherney's request, we find that any non-exempt information in the documents is so inextricably intertwined with the exempt material that release of the non-exempt material would necessarily compromise the withheld material.

3. Documents Responsive to Item 5 of the Appellant's Request

DOE/EE withheld one document in its entirety in response to the Dr. Cherney's request for "[a]ny other documents in the file." This document is a memorandum of a telephone conversation authored by a DOE employee. We find nothing in this memorandum that discusses the substance or merits of the Appellant's proposal and therefore do not agree with DOE/EE that it reflects the agency's deliberative process by which the decision with regard to the proposal was made. Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136, 1143-44 (D.C. Cir. 1975) (withheld material must be "a direct part of the deliberative process in that it makes recommendations or expresses opinions on legal or policy matters"). Accordingly, this document may not be withheld from the Appellant under Exemption 5.

4. Documents Responsive to Item 6 of the Appellant's Request

We reach a similar opinion regarding the 17 documents withheld in their entirety from the Appellant in response to his request for "[a]ny electronic communications or telephone recordings." While small portions of some of these electronic mail messages reflect the opinions of DOE personnel on the merits of Dr. Cherney's proposal, these memoranda by and large discuss the status of DOE's process of reviewing the proposal. There are cases where revealing the status of the agency's decision-making process has been found to necessarily reveal intra-agency or inter-agency pre-decisional opinions on a particular matter. For example, in Wolfe v. HHS, 839 F.2d 768 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (en banc), the requester sought agency logs that revealed "dates on which regulatory proposals, identified by subject matter title, were transmitted from one agency to another." Id. at 771. The court found that material sought was protected by Exemption 5, reasoning that,

The fact of forwarding is, in each instance, the functional equivalent of an intra-agency or inter-agency memorandum that states, "We recommend that a regulation on this [named] subject matter be promulgated." The fact of a failure to forward from the FDA to HHS, or from HHS to OMB is the equivalent of a memorandum from HHS to FDA that states, "We disapprove of your recommendation that a particular regulation on this [named] subject matter be promulgated."

Id. at 774-75.

In the present case, however, no such opinions on the matter being decided, i.e. whether to fund Dr. Cherney's proposal, are revealed by disclosing when or if recommendations on the proposal were forwarded from one office of the DOE to another. Thus, with the minor exception of the small amount of information in some of these memoranda that reveals the opinions of agency personnel on the merits of the Appellant's proposal, these documents are not protected by FOIA Exemption 5.

5. The Public Interest in Disclosure of Material Subject to Exemption 5

As explained earlier, under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1, material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA may be released if disclosure is determined to be in the public interest.

Regarding information withheld under the deliberative process privilege, we find that the public interest is served by the frank and open expression of views by agency employees. The release of this deliberative material could have a chilling effect upon this expression. The ability and willingness of personnel to make honest and open recommendations concerning similar matters in the future could well be compromised. If personnel were inhibited in providing information and recommendations, the agency would be deprived of the benefit of their open and candid opinions. This would stifle the free exchange of ideas and opinions which is essential to the sound functioning of DOE programs. Fulbright & Jaworski, 15 DOE ¶ 80,122 at 80,560 (1987). Consequently, we conclude that release of the withheld material protected under Exemption 5 would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the deliberative process privilege. FAS Engineering, Inc., 27 DOE ¶ 80,126 at 80,562 (1998); see Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (stating that the Department of Justice will defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption).

The appellant put forth two arguments that cite public interests in the disclosure of the information he seeks. First, he points to the public interest in the benefits that would result from deployment of his invention in the form of inexpensive, environmentally safe energy. See, e.g., Memorandum of telephone conversation between Matthew Cherney, M.D., and Steven Goering, OHA (January 4, 1999). Second, he contends that the withheld materials are evidence of criminal fraud, conspiracy to commit fraud, and other illegal behavior on the part of government officials. Id. We agree with the appellant that there is a public interest both in the development of cheap and safe energy supplies and the exposure of illegal conduct by government officials. However, having reviewed the documents in question, we cannot conclude that either interest would be furthered by release of the material we have found to be properly withheld under Exemption 5.

First, there is clearly a dispute as to the feasibility of the appellant's proposal, and this office is far from qualified to resolve that dispute within the scope of the present proceeding, in which we consider only Dr. Cherney's FOIA Appeal. Even if we were to assume that Dr. Cherney's proposal represents a quantum leap forward in energy production technology, we find the connection between the release of the documents in question and the proliferation of this technology to be indirect and tangential at best. Second, while exposure of unlawful conduct on the part of government officials would clearly further the public interest, the information we have found was properly withheld evidences, on its face, no illegal activity of any kind. Therefore, the public interest does not mandate release of the material withheld by DOE/EE under Exemption 5.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we find that DOE/EE properly withheld some material from the Appellant under FOIA Exemption 5. However, we find that other information contained in the relevant documents, as specified above, may not be withheld from Dr. Cherney under Exemption 5. We will therefore remand this matter to DOE/EE so that it may either release the withheld information or issue another determination explaining why the information may be withheld pursuant to another FOIA exemption.(2)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Matthew Cherney, M.D., Case No. VFA-0459, is granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, for further proceedings in accordance with the instructions set forth in this Decision and Order.

of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Office of Hearings and Appeals

(1) DOE/EE did not identify any documents responsive to items 3 and 4 of the Appellant's request in either of its determinations.

(2) Certain portions of the material withheld from these documents may be exempt under FOIA Exemption 6. However, since this was not one of the stated bases for DOE/EE's withholding, we make no finding here on the application of that exemption. If DOE/EE ultimately determines to withhold information under any other FOIA exemption, Dr. Cherney will have the opportunity to appeal that determination to this office.

Case No. VFA-0461, 27 DOE ¶ 80,178

January 6, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: David G. Swanson

Date of Filing: November 30, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0461

On November 30, 1998, David G. Swanson filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on November 13, 1998, by the Office of Inspector General (IG) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination responded to a request for information he filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. Mr. Swanson challenges the adequacy of IG's search for documents responsive to his request.

I. Background

On September 17, 1998, Mr. Swanson filed a request for information in which he sought "a copy of all information available on the investigation of PDI Technology, Inc. of Chino, CA by your [IG's] office, including any final report." On November 13, 1998, IG issued a determination which stated that it was releasing 14 documents in response to Mr. Swanson's request. See Determination Letter at 1. However, IG indicated that portions of 13 documents were withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 and 7(C) of the FOIA.

On November 30, 1998, Mr. Swanson filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals. In his Appeal, Mr. Swanson challenges the adequacy of the search conducted by IG. Specifically, Mr. Swanson contends that the information provided failed to include an interview of him conducted at the "Livermore Inspector General's Office." Mr. Swanson asserts that this interview is related to the investigation of PDI Technology and should have been included in the responsive documents released to him. See Appeal Letter.

II. Analysis

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca

Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further responsive documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was inadequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01, modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted officials at IG to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed and to determine whether any other documents responsive to Mr. Swanson's request might exist. Upon receiving Mr. Swanson's request for information, IG instituted a search of its files. Specifically, IG searched its Management Information System, an automated tool used for recording and tracking information relevant to IG investigative work, by providing it with all of the relevant terms associated with Mr. Swanson's request. Based on this search, IG produced 14 relevant records that were responsive to Mr. Swanson's request. These records were provided to Mr. Swanson with redactions. IG has informed us that this search did not produce an interview of Mr. Swanson as described in his Appeal and that this interview would not have been found in a search related to the PDI investigation, but possibly in a search concerning Mr. Swanson. See December 22, 1998 Record of Telephone Conversation between Pam Langer, IG and Kimberly Jenkins- Chapman, OHA.(1) Given the facts presented to us, we find that IG conducted an adequate search which was reasonably calculated to discover documents responsive to Mr. Swanson's request. Therefore, we must deny this Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by David G. Swanson, OHA Case No. VFA-0461, on November 30, 1998, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: January 6, 1999

(1)Even though IG's search did not locate the transcript of the interview described in Mr. Swanson's Appeal, Mr. Swanson may file a new request with IG if he wants this information.

Case No. VFA-0462, 27 DOE ¶ 80,211

June 14, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:The National Security Archive

Date of Filing:December 7, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0462

The National Security Archive (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque) issued to it on October 28, 1998. In that determination, Albuquerque denied in part a request for information that the Appellant filed on July 6, 1995, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. The information deleted from the document released to the Appellant in that determination was withheld after a review of the document had been performed by the Office of Declassification of the Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs. This Appeal, if granted, would require Albuquerque to release the information that it withheld in its October 28, 1998 determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On July 6, 1995, the Appellant submitted a request under the FOIA to the DOE's Nevada Operations Office for a copy of a report by Hans Bethe, entitled "Analysis of Joe-4," T-527, dated September 11, 1953. "Joe-4" was the name given to the fourth nuclear test conducted by the Soviet Union. After determining that Albuquerque had custody of the requested document, the Nevada Operations Office forwarded the request to Albuquerque. Albuquerque then reviewed the document, determined that it contained information marked as classified, and forwarded it to the DOE's Office of Declassification for review. On October 28, 1998, after the Office of Declassification completed its review, Albuquerque released to the Appellant a copy of the requested document from which it withheld information it claimed to be classified as Restricted Data pursuant to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA.

The present Appeal seeks the disclosure of the withheld portions of the requested document. In its Appeal, the National Security Archive contends that additional portions of the report, specifically, the estimated yield of the test and the role of "AFOAT-1" in collecting data on this test, may be released without jeopardizing the national security. AFOAT was the Air Force Office--Atomic Testing.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., Barton J. Bernstein, 26 DOE ¶ 80,203 (1997); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990). According to the Office of Declassification, the portions that the DOE deleted from the requested document under Exemption 3 were withheld on the grounds that they contain information about nuclear weapons design that has been classified as Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure.

The Director of Security Affairs (SA) has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of SA reviewed those portions of the requested document for which the DOE had claimed an exemption from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA.

In performing his review the Director of SA considered the concerns the Appellant specifically raised in his appeal, and performed as well a general review of the material under the current classification guidance. In his re-evaluation of the report, the Director of SA determined that some of the information that was initially withheld from the Appellant may now be released. The information now being released includes material related to the topics the Appellant addressed in its appeal as well as information contained in the summary of the report and some of its conclusions.

Based on the review performed by the Director of SA under current classification guidance and his conclusions, however, we have determined that the Atomic Energy Act requires the continued withholding of most of those portions of the report that were previously identified as classified information. These portions relate primarily to the design and functioning of United States weapons and the similarity between our weapons and those of Soviet design. This classified information is inextricably intertwined with some unclassified information, which requires the withholding of entire pages of the document, in some instances.

Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information nevertheless, such consideration is not permitted where, as in the application of Exemption 3, the disclosure is prohibited by statute. Therefore, those portions of the report that the Director of SA has determined to be properly classified must continue to be withheld from disclosure. A newly redacted version of the report, containing the additional material that may now be released, will be provided to the Appellant under separate cover. Accordingly, the National Security Archive's Appeal will be granted in part and denied in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the National Security Archive on December 7, 1998, Case No. VFA-0462, is hereby granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) A newly redacted version of the report by Hans Bethe entitled "Analysis of Joe-4," T-527, dated September 11, 1953, in which additional information is released, will be provided to the National Security Archive.

requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

APPEAL

Name of Petitioner: Los Alamos Study Group

Date of Filing: December 7, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0463

On December 7, 1998, the Los Alamos Study Group (the Study Group) filed an Appeal of a determination issued on October 29, 1998, by the Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its Appeal, the Study Group contends that Albuquerque improperly withheld a document under Exemption 5 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5), based on the deliberative process privilege. In the alternative, the Study Group contends that Albuquerque improperly failed to segregate and release factual information contained in this document. For the reasons detailed below, we will remand this matter to Albuquerque and direct it to issue a new determination that either releases this document or provides a detailed reason for withholding information.

BACKGROUND

This Appeal involves the "Site-wide Environmental Impact Statement" (SWEIS) that is currently being prepared for the Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL).(1) On July 7, 1997, the Study Group submitted a FOIA request seeking a copy of a document entitled the "TA-55 SWEIS Key Parameter Data Report"(Data Report).(2)

In response to this FOIA request, on October 29, 1998, the Director of the Office of Public Affairs (Public Affairs Director) issued a determination letter indicating that although a "draft of the specified report" had been located, this document would not be released because it contains predecisional information that may be withheld under Exemption 5 of the FOIA. The Public Affairs Director also indicated that the Data Report was a draft that had never been completed because "the process of developing the information contained in the document was transferred to development of the LANL Sitewide Environmental Impact Statement (SWEIS)," and that the information contained in the Data Report might be inaccurate.

The Public Affairs Director also stated that the Data Report, including the factual information contained in the document, could not be released without harming the process of agency deliberations. In support of this conclusion, he stated that:

[t]he draft document contains much factual information, from which was chosen pertinent information to be included in the SWEIS. . . . 'Selective' facts are entitled to the same protection as that afforded to purely deliberative materials, as their release would 'permit indirect inquiry into the mental process,' and so

'expose' predecisional agency deliberations. . . . In addition, to segregate and release the 'factual portion' of this draft document would reveal the exercise of judgment by agency personnel. Also, release of the draft document and any information contained therein would likely inhibit creative thoughts and candid expression of ideas within the organizations involved and in future such projects; thereby undermining the organizations's ability to perform its functions. (Citations omitted.)

On December 7, 1998, the Study Group appealed this determination to the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). In its Appeal, the Study Group contends that the Data Report is not predecisional and, as a "final" document, is not encompassed by the deliberative process privilege. In support of its position, the Study Group attached a bibliography of the LANL Stockpile Stewardship & Management Master Plan (LANL Master Plan) which lists the Data Report as a source, but does not show that the Data Report is a draft. In the alternative, the Study Group contends that, even if the Data Report is a draft, Albuquerque should have segregated and released the factual portions of the document.

ANALYSIS

For the reasons detailed below, we will remand this matter to Albuquerque and direct it to issue a new determination that either releases this document or provides a detailed reason for withholding information.

EXEMPTION 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents which are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). The courts have held that Exemption 5 encompasses the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corporation v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States).

The deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government decisions and policies are formulated. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. It is intended to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (Mink) (citing Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939 (Ct. Cl. 1958)). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. In order to be shielded by Exemption 5, a document must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id.

Although the deliberative process privilege is generally inapplicable to purely factual matters, there are exceptions to this general rule. The first exception is for those circumstances where factual information was selected from a larger collection of facts as part of the agency's deliberative process, and the release of either the collection of facts or the selected facts would reveal that deliberative process. See Montrose v. Train, 491 F.2d 63 (D.C. Cir. 1974); Dudman Communications v. Department of Air Force, 815 F.2d 1564 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (draft manuscript that contributed to public document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA because release of draft would reveal deliberative process if compared to the public document); but see Mapother v. Department of Justice, 3 F.3d 1533 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (agency required to release chronology prepared by staff because it was a "comprehensive collection of essential facts," reflected no point of view, and relationship between release of chronology and exposure of deliberative process was too attenuated). The second exception is for factual information that is so inextricably intertwined with deliberative material that its exposure would reveal the agency's deliberative process. Wolfe v. HHS, 839

F.2d 769, 774-76 (D.C. Cir. 1988).

THE DATA REPORT

To determine whether the Data Report was properly withheld under the deliberative process privilege, we asked counsel for the DOE Los Alamos Area Office (LAAO) for information concerning its purpose and use, and we also conducted an independent examination of the document. Counsel informed us that this document is a preliminary draft that was prepared by a government contractor for use by DOE in the preparation of the LANL SWEIS on matters relating to the TA-55 facility. Counsel characterized the Data Report as a large collection of facts that had been used by the drafters of the SWEIS as a body of information from which they selected pertinent information for inclusion in the SWEIS.(3) Counsel indicated that the Data Report has never been reviewed for accuracy.

Counsel also stated that, if Albuquerque released the Data Report, a reader could gain insight into the deliberative process that resulted in the SWEIS by comparing the facts set forth in the Data Report with the facts selected for inclusion in the SWEIS. Thus, a reader who compared these documents could obtain information concerning the exercise of judgment by agency personnel. See Memoranda from Lisa Cummings, Area Counsel for the DOE Los Alamos Area Office, to Linda Lazarus, Staff Attorney, OHA (December 17 and 23, 1998).

Counsel further indicated that the release of documents such as the Data Report would have a chilling effect on government decision-makers because:

[i]f draft documents such as these must be released to the public, an agency may be loath in the future to amass large amounts of information and expose itself to public scrutiny of it[s] decisonmaking process regarding what facts it believes are pertinent to be included in the final document. If unable to freely collect all pertinent facts for such a process, the quality of documents will suffer.

See Memorandum from Lisa Cummings to Linda Lazarus (December 23, 1998).

Based on our independent review of the Data Report, we learned that it is a fifty-seven-page document, consisting of a three-page Table of Contents, twenty-five pages of text, and twenty-nine pages of figures and tables. The document has the appearance of a draft. Each page has the word "DRAFT" at the top, there is no cover page, and some of the tables appear to be incomplete. Additionally, certain common words are abbreviated. The text of the Data Report is divided by the use of headings and sub-headings. The Table of Contents lists each heading and sub-heading, and indicates the page number of the Data Report on which the heading or sub-heading can be found. The following are some of the headings that appear in the Data Report: 1) Objective; 2) Introduction; and 3) Summary. The Data Report states that it provides a "technical aid and data source for those preparing the Los Alamos Site- Wide Environmental Impact Statement." A substantial amount of the information contained in the Data Report seems to be factual in nature.

BASIS FOR REMAND

The FOIA requires that “[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection.” 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Based on the information outlined above, we cannot conclude that the Data Report was properly withheld in its entirety because we are not persuaded that the deliberative process would be exposed in the event that segregable portions of this document were released.(4)

Counsel's argument that the release of the Data Report would expose the deliberative process because it could be compared to the SWEIS to ascertain which facts were excluded from the SWEIS does not justify the withholding of all the material in the Data Report. This argument justifies only the non-release of the part of the Data Report that consists of a body of facts from which facts were selected for the SWEIS.

However, as detailed above, there are other types of material contained in the Data Report. For example, the document contains headings, such as "Objective," "Introduction," and "Summary," that do not contain such factual information. Moreover, the statement in the Data Report that it provides a "technical aid and data source for those preparing the Los Alamos Site-Wide Environmental Impact Statement" is also not part of a body of facts that was used as the source of the factual information in the SWEIS.(5) Albuquerque has not explained the reason that such material was not segregated and released.(6)

Accordingly, because we are unable to determine whether Albuquerque correctly withheld the Data Report under the deliberative process privilege, we will remand this matter to Albuquerque to determine if this document, or any information contained in this document, may be released without exposing the deliberative process. Albuquerque must then issue a new determination letter in which it releases this information, withholds it under other applicable FOIA exemptions, or provides a detailed explanation of the reason that release of the withheld information would expose the deliberative process.

Moreover, on remand, Albuquerque must comply with the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA that provide that “[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 552 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest.” 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. On remand, Albuquerque should review the Data Report in order to determine whether its release would be in the public interest. If any of the requested information is still withheld on remand, the new determination letter should set forth reasons why release of this information would not be in the public interest.

Furthermore, it is the policy of the DOE with respect to Exemption 5 to withhold only information that, if released, would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that it protects. See Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (to withhold material, agency must first determine that release would foreseeably harm basic institutional interests that underlie the exemption claimed). Accordingly, on remand, Albuquerque must consider whether release of any information it intends to withhold would result in foreseeably harm to the interests that are protected by Exemption 5.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Los Alamos Study Group on December 7, 1998, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is remanded to Albuquerque to review the "TA-55 SWEIS Key Parameter Data Report" to determine if the release of this document, in whole or in part, would expose the deliberative process. Albuquerque must then issue a new determination letter in which it releases this information, withholds it under other applicable FOIA exemptions, or provides a detailed explanation of the reason that release of the withheld information would expose the deliberative process. Furthermore, on remand, Albuquerque should consider whether release of the withheld information would be in the public interest or result in foreseeable harm to interests that are protected by Exemption 5.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of busi ness, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)A SWEIS provides DOE and the public with an analysis of the environmental impacts of past, present and reasonably foreseeable activities at a site, and compares these activities with reasonable alternatives to permit DOE to make more informed decisions regarding its activities, operations and resources. A SWEIS was last prepared for LANL in 1979. See "Notice of Intent to Prepare the SWEIS for the Los Alamos National Laboratory," 60 Fed. Reg. 25697 (May 12, 1995).

(2)LANL's proposed SWEIS specifically describes fifteen facilities, including TA-55. See Memorandum from Lisa Cummings to Linda Lazarus (December 17, 1998).

(3)Counsel also indicated that the Data Report was used as a "springboard" to develop the concepts expressed in the SWEIS.

(4)We do, however, find that this document is predecisional in nature. It is clear that the Data Report is, in fact, a draft. The non-final nature of this document is reflected in the fact that the word "DRAFT" appears at the top of each page, there is no cover page, several of the tables seem to be incomplete, and words are sometimes abbreviated. Moreover, counsel for LAAO has stated that the document was a preliminary draft used to prepare the SWEIS. Although the Data Report was listed, without reference to its draft status, in a bibliography of the LANL Master Plan, this does not affect our conclusion that the Data Report is a draft. Both drafts and non- drafts are listed in the LANL Master Plan bibliography, and the fact that the Data Report was not designated as a draft in the bibliography could have resulted from an oversight.

(5)Albuquerque also alleged that it should not be required to release the factual material in the Data Report because the factual material may be inaccurate. We find this argument unpersuasive. An agency cannot shield factual information from disclosure under the deliberative process privilege on the grounds that such information may be inaccurate. To hold otherwise could result in the expansion of the deliberative process privilege to include virtually all factual materials because nearly all factual information may arguably be inaccurate.

(6)It is not clear whether Albuquerque is claiming that there is non-factual deliberative material in the Data Report. On remand, in the event that Albuquerque continues to withhold any part of the Data Report under the deliberative process privilege, the new determination must specify whether the information withheld is factual or deliberative.

Case No. VFA-0464, 27 DOE ¶ 80,227

September 1, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:The National Security Archive

Date of Filing:December 9, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0464

The National Security Archive filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on October 13, 1998, by the Manpower, Personnel and Administration Directorate, United States European Command, of the Department of Defense (USEUCOM). In that determination, USEUCOM denied in part a request for information that the National Security Archive filed on August 19, 1994, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. The information deleted from one of the documents USEUCOM released in that determination was withheld pursuant to a review of the documents by the Office of Declassification of the Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to instruct USEUCOM that the DOE no longer requires the classification and withholding of the information that USEUCOM withheld on the DOE's behalf.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On August 19, 1994, the National Security Archive submitted a request under the FOIA to USEUCOM for histories relating to "NATO nuclear forces, deployments of [intermediate range ballistic missiles], command and control over nuclear forces, and nuclear weapon safety" in the years 1957 through 1962. On August 16, 1996, USEUCOM sent excerpts of the 1961 and 1962 histories to the DOE for classification review. In response to that request, the DOE advised USEUCOM on June 17, 1998, that the 1961 history contained classified information that it considered exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). The DOE reported that the 1962 history, however, contained no DOE classified information. On October 13, 1998, USEUCOM released to the National Security Archive a copy of the 1962 history in its entirety and a copy of the 1961 history from which it withheld information that the DOE claimed was exempt from disclosure under the FOIA.

In its Appeal to the DOE, the National Security Archive seeks the disclosure of those portions of the 1961 history that USEUCOM withheld at the request of the DOE. The Appellant contends that the information the DOE has identified as classified should be declassified and released, because the report was prepared 35 years ago, the United States withdrew almost all of its nuclear weapons from Europe nearly ten years ago, and the DOE released data on the United States nuclear stockpile through 1961 several years ago.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., Hans M. Kristensen, 27 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1999); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990). The information that the DOE deleted under Exemption 3 concerns Fiscal Year (FY) 1964 Atomic Weapon Planning for United States Europe warhead requirements and a FY 1962 plan for the dispersal of nuclear weapons, which the DOE classified as Formerly Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act.

Upon referral of the Appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Office of Security Affairs again reviewed the withheld portions of the 1961 history for which the DOE had claimed exemption from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA. It has informed us that current classification guidance indicates that the classification of planning information for nuclear weapons that are based outside the United Stated and its territories is to be determined by the parties concerned. Based on that guidance, it has now concluded that the document no longer contains any information that needs to remain classified by the DOE. Because the 1961 history is not a DOE document, that Office will return the document to USEUCOM for its consideration for release in light of the DOE's new stance on this matter. USEUCOM will then inform the National Security Archive directly of its own determination concerning the release of that information. Accordingly, the National Security Archive's Appeal will be granted.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by The National Security Archive on December 9, 1998, Case No. VFA-0464, is hereby granted.

(2) The Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Declassification shall inform the Department of Defense, United States European Command (USEUCOM), that the 1961 USEUCOM History contains no DOE classified information.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:McKenna & Cuneo, L.L.P.

Date of Filing:December 10, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0465

On December 10, 1998, McKenna & Cuneo, L.L.P. (McKenna) filed an Appeal from a determination the Acting Manager of the Chicago Operations Office (Acting Manager) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to the firm on November 12, 1998. In that determination, the Acting Manager partially granted a June 15, 1998 request for information that McKenna filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b).

In McKenna's request for information, the firm sought copies of documents related to a DOE contract solicitation. In his determination, the Acting Manager released several responsive documents, but redacted labor rates, profit amounts, and indirect expense rates in accordance with 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4). The Acting Manager also withheld from release three pages of documents containing communications between the DOE Counsel and the Acquisition and Assistance Group pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). McKenna contends that the Acting Manager did not properly identify all of the documents he redacted and withheld. The firm states that several of the documents released to it indicate that other responsive pages or complete responsive documents exist. Without additional information to identify the pages or documents the Acting Manager redacted or withheld, McKenna argues that it is impossible to determine whether the Acting Manager properly withheld information pursuant to the FOIA.

Analysis

So that we may determine whether the Acting Manager properly identified all of the information responsive to McKenna's request, we must first verify whether the Acting Manager conducted a thorough search for all responsive information. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

We have also consistently held that the FOIA requires the authorizing official give reasonably informative descriptions of the documents or portions of documents being withheld that are sufficient to allow the requester to understand the determination and if appropriate to formulate a meaningful appeal. See, e.g., Klickitat Energy Partners, 25 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1995); Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,527 (1984); Exxon Co., USA, 5 DOE ¶ 80,178 at 80,813 (1980); Cities Service Co., 5 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,502 (1980). Descriptions are generally adequate if each document is identified by a brief description of the subject matter it discusses and "if available, the date each document was produced [and] its authors and recipients. . . ." Klickitat Energy Partners, 25 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1995); Petroleum Delivery Service, 5 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1980). We have indicated that the "brief description" requirement is generally satisfied if sufficiently informative titles of the withheld documents are provided and that the descriptions need not contain factual information that would compromise the privileged nature of the documents. Klickitat Energy Partners, 25 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1995); P.A. Barnes, 5 DOE ¶ 80,112 at 80,538 (1980); Akin Gump, Hauer & Feld, 3 DOE ¶ 80,155 at 90,765 (1979).

McKenna states that documents the firm received from the Acting Manager indicate the possible existence of other responsive information. McKenna cites 11 examples where the firm believes that other responsive documents or portions of documents exist. In none of these 11 examples did the Acting Manager identify responsive information being withheld. These potentially responsive documents include specifically named documents, attachments referred to in letters or facsimile cover sheets, and missing numbered pages. McKenna also believes that circumstances dictate the existence of other responsive documents.

In reviewing the appeal, we contacted a representative of the Acting Manager to ascertain the validity of McKenna's contention that there must exist additional responsive information. We supplied the Acting Manager's representative with the additional information McKenna provided in its appeal. The Acting Manager's representative confirmed that at least one of these 11 examples of potentially responsive documents McKenna cites does exist and was not properly identified in the Acting Manager's response. See Record of January 8, 1999 Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, and Kim Donham, Chicago Operations Office. The Acting Manager's representative is continuing to search for additional responsive information. Since the Acting Manager's initial search was incomplete and since the Acting Manager's determination did not include enough information to allow McKenna to reasonably understand the determination and formulate a meaningful appeal, we must remand this determination to the Acting Manager for a new search and a more informative description of any withheld information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal McKenna & Cuneo, L.L.P. filed on December 10, 1998, Case No. VFA-0465, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Acting Manager of the Chicago Operations Office of the Department of Energy for a new search pursuant to McKenna & Cuneo, L.L.P.'s June 15, 1998 request for information and a reasonably informative description of the documents or portions of documents being withheld from this request for information that is sufficient to allow McKenna & Cuneo, L.L.P. to understand the Acting Manager's determination.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

January 12, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Jennifer Kuehnle

Date of Filings: December 14, 1998

Case Numbers: VFA-0466

On December 14, 1998, Jennifer Kuehnle (Kuehnle) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that the DOE Oakland Operations Office (Oakland) issued to her on November 20, 1998. The determination concerned a request for information that Kuehnle submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, Oakland would be required to conduct a further search for responsive material.

I. Background

In a letter to Oakland, Kuehnle requested three documents: (1) the draft version of "Production and Use of Beryllia Ceramics at Coors Ceramics Company," dated March 5, 1990; (2) the final version of the above document; and (3) pages 179-192 and 199-202 of "Final Operation Report of the Manufacture of Beryllia-Urania Fuel Elements for the Tory II-C Reactor," dated May 31, 1963. Letter from Kuehnle to Oakland (October 19, 1998). Oakland forwarded the request to the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory (Livermore). The staff of the laboratory archives conducted an unsuccessful search of all classified and unclassified data bases in the archives. Letter from Livermore to Oakland (November 12, 1998). Livermore further stated that the documents did not carry any report numbers that would identify them as having been created in their organization, and that the 1990 document title referred to a project that was terminated at Livermore in the 1960s. Id. Consequently, Oakland sent Kuehnle a determination letter informing her that no responsive documents were found. Letter from Oakland FOIA Authorizing Official to Kuehnle (November 20, 1998). However, according to Kuehnle, the previous summer Oakland had released copies of portions of the requested documents to her in response to an earlier FOIA request. Letter from Kuehnle to Oakland (December 14, 1998) (Appeal). In fact, Kuehnle attached copies of portions of the two documents to this Appeal, challenging the adequacy of Oakland's search. Id.

II. Analysis

In responding to a request for information filed under the FOIA, it is well established that an agency must "conduct a search reasonably calculated to uncover all relevant documents." Truitt v. Department of State, 897 F.2d 540, 542 (D.C. Cir. 1990). "The standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Truitt, 897 F.2d at 542. We have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Glen Milner, 17 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1988).

We contacted Oakland to ascertain the scope of the most recent search, particularly in light of Kuehnle's contention that Oakland had released some responsive material to her the previous year. Oakland confirmed the allegation, but could not explain Livermore's inability to find any responsive material for this request. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Rose Ann Pelzner Goodwin, Oakland FOIA Officer, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (January 7, 1999). Nonetheless, Oakland agreed to ask the Livermore staff members who provided the partial documents in the past to now provide Kuehnle with complete documents. Id.(1)

In addition, Oakland informed us that upon receiving the Appeal, they reviewed the search conducted in response to the October 19, 1998 request. In the course of that review, the FOIA Officer was informed that the labs at Livermore and Berkeley were once a single entity and that Berkeley archives might contain some responsive information. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Rose Ann Pelzner Goodwin, Oakland FOIA Officer, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (December 31, 1998). As a result, the Oakland FOIA Officer requested that the librarian search the archives for Berkeley information, and that search was initiated after the labs reopened for the new year. Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Rose Ann Pelzner Goodwin, Oakland FOIA Officer, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (January 7, 1999).

In summary, Oakland has agreed to conduct a further search at Livermore for complete documents, and to search the Berkeley archives for any responsive information. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to Oakland for the release of any additional non-exempt responsive material.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on December 14, 1998 by Jennifer Kuehnle, OHA Case No. VFA-0466, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Oakland Freedom of Information Act Officer who will promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

(3 This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0467, 27 DOE ¶ 80,183

January 21, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:The Oregonian

Date of Filing:December 21, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0467

On December 21, 1998, The Oregonian, a newspaper located in Portland, Oregon, filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it by the Department of Energy's Bonneville Power Administration (BPA). The BPA issued this determination in response to a previous Decision and Order that this office issued on February 3, 1998 (The Oregonian I). The Appeal, if granted, would require that documents that the BPA withheld be released in whole or in part.

The Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004, generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document that is exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In its FOIA requests, The Oregonian had sought access to all expense records and related correspondence pertaining to the defense of lawsuits filed by Chase Manhattan Bank and Tenaska Washington Partners II against the BPA. In response to the requests, the BPA released a wealth of material -- mainly copies of contracts by which it has procured legal advice, analysis and assistance in contesting the lawsuits. The BPA withheld a number of documents, including travel vouchers, estimates of future litigation expenses, and invoices for shipping, travel, courier and legal expenses pursuant to the attorney-client and attorney work product privileges. Finding that the information it was withholding was encompassed by Exemption 5 of the FOIA, BPA stated that release of these documents "might prejudice BPA in the current litigation with Tenaska by revealing BPA's litigation strategies." BPA's Original Determination at 2.

The Oregonian appealed, claiming that BPA applied Exemption 5 too broadly in withholding the expense-related documents in their entirety. The newspaper contended that BPA improperly withheld documents "which cannot possibly reveal attorney thought processes or truly confidential attorney- client communications." The Oregonian's Original Appeal at 3.

On February 3, 1998, OHA issued a decision and order in which we found:

[S]ome of the material withheld by BPA is not subject to the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges. This non-exempt material includes information pertaining to travel, copying, communications, shipping and courier service expenses, as well as the attorneys' identities. Based on the record before us, we cannot conclude that release of this information would reveal BPA's litigation strategy or the mental impressions, conclusions, or legal theories of their attorneys.

The Oregonian I, 27 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,516 (1998) (The Oregonian I). However, we also found the expense statements at issue also contained information which could reflect BPA's litigation strategy or the thoughts and conclusions of BPA's outside counsel. Accordingly, we concluded:

This information consists of the descriptions of the specific services performed by the attorneys, the dates on which those services were performed, the hours billed by each attorney, and the amounts charged for each attorney's services. Disclosure of this information would provide opposing counsel with insights into BPA's litigation strategy and would reveal the timing and intensity of the legal services provided. Release of the number of hours billed by the attorneys, as well as the dollar amounts charged, would indicate the manner in which the outside counsel's legal services were being allocated and could therefore reveal an important component of BPA's legal strategy. This information was therefore properly withheld under Exemption 5.

Id. Therefore, we remanded the appeal to BPA. On remand, BPA was instructed to review the withheld material in accordance with the guidelines set forth above, and to make every reasonable attempt to segregate and release non-exempt material.

In response to our remand, BPA issued another determination letter on November 12, 1998 (the November 12th Determination Letter). The November 12th Determination Letter released copies of the requested billing records from which it redacted information that it continues to find exempt. Specifically, BPA continues to categorically withhold those portions of the billing statements which describe (1) the services performed by attorneys, consultants and witnesses, (2) the dates on which those services were performed (3) the hours billed by each attorney, witness or consultant and (4) the amounts charged for the services of each attorney, witness or consultant. BPA justified its withholdings under Exemption 5 by stating, in pertinent part:

[T]he release of this exempt material would not be in the public interest and would harm the interest[s] protected by the attorney-client and attorney work product privileges by revealing BPA's litigation strategy and the thought processes of outside counsel. Release of this information, even after litigation is concluded, could discourage BPA's outside counsel from providing similarly detailed information in future billings, thus impeding BPA's ability in any future litigation, to effectively monitor and control legal costs. BPA continues to believe that the release of the withheld information would result in foreseeable harm to the BPA institutional interests that are protected by Exemption 5.

November 12th Determination Letter. On December 21, 1998, The Oregonian filed the present Appeal.

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of the Determination

After conducting a search for responsive documents under the FOIA, the statute requires that the agency provide the requester with a written determination notifying the requester of the results of that search and, if applicable, of the agency's intentions to withhold any of the responsive information under one or more of the nine statutory exemptions to the FOIA. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). The statute further requires that the agency provide the requester with an opportunity to appeal any adverse determination. Id.

The written determination letter informs the requester of the results of the agency's search for responsive documents and of any withholdings that the agency intends to make. In doing so, the determination letter allows the requester to decide whether the agency's response to its request was adequate and proper and provides this office with a record upon which to base its consideration of an administrative appeal.

It therefore follows that the agency has an obligation to ensure that its determination letters: (1) adequately describe the results of searches; (2) clearly indicate which information was withheld, and (3) specify the exemption(s) under which information was withheld. Research Information Services, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,139 (1996); Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,205 at 80,767 (1996). Without an adequately informative determination letter, the requester and the review authority must speculate about the appropriateness of the agency's determinations. Id.

As an initial matter, we note that the November 12th Determination Letter claims the attorney-client privilege, but fails to explain to which withheld information it is applying this privilege. Moreover, the November 12th Determination Letter fails to provide any justification of its withholdings under the attorney-client privilege. We have reviewed a representative sample of the withheld documents and it is not clear to us that the withheld information is protectable under the attorney-client privilege.

Our review also indicates that the November 12th Determination Letter is flawed in two important ways. First, The Oregonian contends that BPA's determination letter:

[D]id not include any supporting documentation provided to BPA by [its outside counsel] as part of its routine billings. BPA, by its own actions, had earlier identified these supporting records as subject to the FOIA request. Yet when BPA offered its FOIA response, the records were not only missing, but the agency also failed to explain it was withholding these records.

December 21, 1998 Appeal at 5. Our review of a representative sample of the billing information BPA received from its outside counsel supports this contention. The billing information that BPA received from its outside counsel was accompanied by supporting documentation including telephone bills and hotel invoices. This supporting documentation was responsive to The Oregonian's requests and therefore BPA should have identified it as responsive to the requests and either released this information or justified its withholding.

In addition, as discussed in the next section, the November 12th Determination Letter inappropriately justifies its categorical withholdings under Exemption 5's attorney work product and attorney-client privileges by referring to an analysis appropriate only under Exemption 4.

We are therefore remanding this matter to BPA. On remand, BPA should issue a new determination letter in which it identifies each document responsive to The Oregonian's requests, indicates whether any responsive document (or portion thereof) has been withheld, and justifies any withholdings. The new determination letter must also specifically indicate which exemptions or privileges are being applied to each withholding.

B. Applicability of Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that Exemption 5 incorporates those "privileges which the Government enjoys under the relevant statutory and case law in the pre-trial discovery context." Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184 (1975). The attorney-client and attorney work product privileges are among the privileges incorporated by the courts under Exemption 5. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States).

The attorney-client and the attorney work product privileges are frequently confused with each other. The attorney-client privilege exists to protect confidential communications between attorneys and their clients made for the purpose of securing or providing legal advice. In Re Grand Jury Proceedings 88-9 (MIA), 899 F.2d 1039 (11th Cir. 1990); In Re Grand Jury Subpoena of Slaughter, 694 F.2d 1258, 1260 (11th Cir. 1982); 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence, § 2291, p. 590 (McNaughton Rev. Ed. 1961); McCormack, Law of Evidence, Sec. 87, p.175 (2d ed. E. Cleary 1972). Not all communications between attorney and client are privileged, however. Clark v. American Commerce National Bank, 974 F.2d 127 (9th Cir. 1992) (Clark). The courts have limited the protection of the privilege to those disclosures necessary to obtain or provide legal advice. Fisher v. United States, 96 S. Ct. 1569, 1577 (1976) (Fisher). In other words, the privilege does not extend to social, informational, or procedural communications between attorney and client.

The attorney work product privilege protects from disclosure documents which reveal "the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories of an attorney or other representative of a party concerning the litigation." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3); see also Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 511 (1947). This privilege is also limited. It does not extend to every written document generated by an attorney. In order to be afforded protection under the attorney work product privilege, a document must have been prepared either for trial or in anticipation of litigation. See, e.g., Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 865.

The billing statements involved in this case set forth, on a daily basis, the date of the services provided, the name of the attorney providing the services, a brief description of the nature of the services provided, the daily number of hours billed by each attorney and the hourly cost of those services. The billing statements also state the amounts charged for various administrative services such as court reporting and photocopying.

It is well settled that attorney fee information is normally not privileged. See, e.g., Clark, 974 F.2d at 129; United States v. Leventhal, 961 F.2d 936, 940 (11th Cir. 1992); United States v. Sims, 845 F.2d 1564, 1568 (11th Cir. 1988); In Re Slaughter, 694 F.2d 1259, 1260 (11th Cir. 1982); In Re Grand Jury Proceedings (Jones), 517 F.2d 666, 671 (5th Cir. 1975); Indian Law Resource Center, 477 F. Supp. 144, 147 (D.D.C. 1979) (Indian Law). For example, the courts have repeatedly found that the specific amount of fees paid to attorneys is not privileged. See, e.g., In Re Grand Jury Witness (Salas, Waxman), 695 F.2d 359 (9th Cir. 1982) (Salas). Nor is the general purpose for which the legal work was performed usually privileged. Clark, 974 F.2d at 129. However, in those cases where a party has been able to show that the attorney billing statements or time records at issue reveal the motive of the client in seeking representation, litigation strategy, privileged communications or the specific nature of the services provided by attorneys, such as research into particular areas of the law, courts have found them to be privileged. Id.; Salas, 695 F.2d at 362 (emphasis supplied).

Accordingly, we have held that information in expense records pertaining to the total amount charged by a law firm for a litigation, the attorneys' identities, their hourly rates, and the costs of travel, reporting services and document reproduction are generally not exempt from disclosure pursuant to the attorney-client or attorney work product privileges. See, e.g., William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,161 (1997); C.D. Varnadore and Betty Freels, 24 DOE ¶ 80,123 (1994). Information that could reveal the litigation strategy, thoughts or impressions of the attorneys, however, is protected from mandatory disclosure under these privileges. Id.

Turning to the present case, it is important to note that the litigation between BPA and the Tenaska Washington Partnership II has recently been settled. The significance of this settlement is that some of the information which was originally properly withheld under the attorney work product privilege may no longer be properly withheld under that privilege.

Prior to October 4, 1993, an agency could withhold information under any of the privileges encompassed by Exemption 5 as long as there was "a substantial legal basis" for doing so. However, on that date, Attorney General Janet Reno issued a Memorandum for Heads of Departments and Agencies, which requires that FOIA exemptions be applied only in those circumstances where release can reasonably be expected to harm a protectable interest. See FOIA Update, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Information and Privacy (Spring 1994); Memorandum from Janet Reno, Attorney General, to Heads of Departments and Agencies (October 4, 1993) (the Reno Memorandum). As a result of the policies adopted in the Reno Memorandum, BPA must now show that release of information could reasonably be expected to harm an interest protectable under Exemption 5 in order to withhold it under Exemption 5. The Reno Memorandum ("it shall be the policy of the U.S. Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency reasonably foresees that disclosure would be harmful to an interest protected by that exemption").

Prior to the termination of litigation to which the agency is a party, the release of any information, generated in expectation or preparation for that litigation that might reveal the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or legal theories of the agency's attorneys or representatives could reasonably be expected to interfere with the agency's litigation efforts. Such information may therefore be categorically withheld under Exemption 5. However, once that litigation is resolved, the release of that information cannot harm the agency's interests in the resolved litigation. However, it is foreseeable that the release of some of that information which could be protected from mandatory disclosure under the attorney work product privilege prior to the termination of the litigation might continue to harm the agency's other litigation interests even after the original litigation has concluded. For example, information that could reasonably be expected to reveal the agency's settlement threshold or that could reasonably be expected to reveal litigation strategies that might be used in other cases could properly be withheld. In such circumstances, it would be entirely appropriate to continue withholding such information under Exemption 5's attorney work product privilege.

However, the interest cited by BPA in justifying its decision to withhold the information was not among those interests protected by the attorney work product privilege. BPA's determination letter contends:

Release of this information, even after litigation is concluded, could discourage BPA's outside counsel from providing similarly detailed information in future billings, thus impeding BPA's ability in any future litigation to effectively monitor and control legal costs.

November 12, 1998 Determination Letter. This justification is not appropriate under Exemption 5's attorney work product privilege. The purpose of the attorney work product privilege is to protect the adversarial trial process by insulating attorneys' preparations from scrutiny by opposing parties. See Jordan v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 591 F.2d 755 (D.C. Cir. 1978) (en banc). The attorney work product privilege was clearly not created with the intention to protect the rights of clients to receive accurate and reliable billing statements. (1)

Applying these principles to the present case, we find that BPA has not properly applied Exemption 5 to the attorney billing information. Specifically, we find that BPA has categorically withheld all portions of the attorney billing statements that describe (1) the services performed by attorneys, consultants and witnesses, (2) the dates on which those services were performed, (3) the hours billed by each attorney, witness or consultant, and (4) the amounts charged for the services of each attorney, witness or consultant without segregating and releasing that information which could not reasonably be expected to harm interests protected under Exemption 5's attorney work product privilege now that the subject litigation has ended. In addition, BPA applied a justification available only under Exemption 4 to some of its withholdings under Exemption 5.

Accordingly, we are remanding this matter to BPA. On remand, BPA must conduct a line-by-line review of any information responsive to the requests at issue in the present case which it has withheld under the attorney work product privilege. This information should then be released, withheld under another appropriately applied and justified FOIA exemption or privilege, or withheld under Exemption 5, but with an adequate explanation showing how its release could reasonably be expected to harm interests protectable under Exemption 5.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we are remanding this matter to BPA for further processing in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by The Oregonian on December 21, 1998 is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Bonneville Power Administration for further proceedings consistent with the guidelines set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)In some circumstances however, release of information which the government has obtained from outside sources might reasonably be expected to impair the agency's ability to obtain similar information in the future. In those circumstances, such information may be withheld under FOIA Exemption 4. Exemption 4 permits an agency to withhold from public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, a record must consist of either (A) "trade secrets" or (B) information that is: (1) "commercial or financial," (2) "obtained from a person," and (3) "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Association v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the D.C. Circuit established the broadly employed "National Parks" test for defining "confidential" information. Under this test, commercial or financial information is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if its disclosure is likely to either impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (Critical Mass) (emphasis supplied); National Parks, 498 F.2d at 770. In most circumstances, it is unlikely that disclosure of information subject to a filing requirement would impair the government's ability to obtain similar information in the future. Accordingly, the courts have presumed that the Government's interest in receiving similar information in the future is not threatened by disclosure of information that is required to be submitted. Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 878; National Parks, 498 F.2d at 770. This presumption is clearly rebuttable. SeeCritical Mass, 975 F.2d at 878; Washington Post v. Department of Health & Human Services, 690 F.2d 252, 268-69 (D.C. Cir. 1982). However, it can only be rebutted by a preponderance of evidence showing that disclosure would likely impair the government's future ability to obtain similar information.

Case No. VFA-0468, 27 DOE ¶ 80,184

January 21, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Tod N. Rockefeller

Date of Filing: December 22, 1998

Case Number: VFA-0468

On December 22, 1998, Tod N. Rockefeller (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on December 15, 1998, by the Freedom of Information Officer at the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (DOE/AL). That determination followed a Decision and Order of this Office in which the Appellant appealed a previous determination by the DOE/AL. See Tod N. Rockefeller, 27 DOE ¶ 80,167 (1998) (Rockefeller). DOE/AL's first determination denied the Appellant's request for a fee waiver with regard to a request for information submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In Rockefeller, we affirmed DOE/AL's denial of a fee waiver. DOE/AL then requested that the Appellant provide adequate assurances that he would pay the fees associated with processing his FOIA request. The Appellant failed to provide what DOE/AL considered adequate assurances and that office notified him that it was administratively closing his case. If the present Appeal were granted, the DOE would be ordered to continue processing the Appellant's case and conduct his initially requested search under a full fee waiver.

I. Background

In an August 4, 1998 FOIA request, the Appellant sought information connected with his dismissal from his job and a waiver of fees for processing that request. In a September 24, 1998 determination, DOE/AL denied the Appellant's request for a fee waiver.

The Appellant appealed, and in Rockefeller, we found that a fee waiver should not be granted to the Appellant. Rockefeller, 27 DOE at 80,667. DOE/AL then requested that the Appellant provide adequate assurances that he would pay the fees that would be incurred in processing the Appellant's August 4, 1998 request. The Appellant responded in the following manner: "while Mr. Rockefeller is willing to pay fees if a fee waiver were denied, he is unemployed. He is unwilling to pay improper fees, excessive fees, exorbitant fees, confiscatory fees, or retaliatory fees." Letter from Appellant's Counsel to Elva Ann Barfield, Freedom of Information Officer, DOE/AL (December 5, 1998). DOE/AL responded that since it did not consider this response to convey the Appellant's willingness to pay fees as requested, it was closing the Appellant's request file. Letter from Elva Ann Barfield to Appellant's Counsel (December 15, 1998). The Appellant subsequently filed the present Appeal in which he contends that he had adequately conveyed the willingness to pay "reasonable" fees and challenges our original Rockefeller determination. Letter from Appellant's Counsel to Director, OHA (December 22, 1998) (Appeal Letter).

II. Analysis

In the Appeal Letter, the Appellant made a number of different arguments. First, he argued that his December 5, 1998 letter adequately conveyed his willingness to pay "reasonable" fees. Second, he argued that we should overturn our Rockefeller determination because he now meets all of the requirements for granting a fee waiver and because this Office failed to consider an important document in reaching our fee waiver determination. Third, he noted that he has made two additional FOIA requests that he does not believe that DOE/AL is processing.

We have examined each of the Appellant's arguments carefully and make the following determinations. First, we note that the question of whether the Appellant has adequately conveyed his willingness to pay fees would not normally appear to be a question subject to this Office's jurisdiction as laid out in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a).(1) However, because this issue is related to the Appellant's fee waiver denial (an issue squarely within our jurisdiction) and because we are mindful that the DOE intends to provide customer-friendly service whenever possible, we will resolve the issue the Appellant has raised.

We find that the Appellant's offer to pay only legal, non-excessive and reasonable fees is not adequate. Requesters may state their willingness to pay only fees provided for by either the DOE regulations or the FOIA statute. They may also place certain limitations on their assurance to pay fees such as the amount of costs they are willing to authorize the agency to incur. However, the Appellant's limitation appears to leave the discretion as to the definition of "excessive" and "reasonable" to the Appellant. This puts the shoe on the wrong foot. DOE/AL is the deciding authority in the first instance. The subjective limitation which the Appellant seeks cannot be considered a satisfactory assurance of full payment. For this reason, it was not improper for DOE/AL to administratively close the Appellant's August 4, 1998 request.(2)

Next, we do not agree with the Appellant that he now meets all of the requirements for granting a fee waiver. In our Rockefeller decision, we found that the Appellant failed to meet the requirements of Factor C and Factor D of the fee waiver test. Factor C is the amount of "the contribution to an understanding by the general public of the subject likely to result from disclosure." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(a)(8)(i)(C). To meet this test, the requester must have the ability and intention to disseminate this information to the public. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 26 DOE ¶ 80,153 at 80,671 (1997). The only additional information on this topic the Appellant has provided is that he is obtaining statements "from New Mexico citizens concerned about environmental issues and expect[s] to file them soon." See Appeal Letter at 2. This information is irrelevant because it conveys nothing about the Appellant's ability to spread the information obtained to the general public at large. Therefore, we find that the Appellant has again failed to meet Factor C of this test. Cf. Glen Milner, 26 DOE ¶ 80,147 at 80,649 (1996) (Factor C met where requester had had articles published in major newspapers and a New York Times reporter stated that the requested documents were newsworthy).(3) Because the meeting of Factor C is a pre-requisite for addressing Factor D (the significance of the contribution made to public understanding), Factor D need not be considered. Therefore, we find no reason to grant a fee waiver and overturn our earlier Rockefeller decision

With regard to the Appellant's final argument, the Appellant asserts that he made two additional information requests to DOE/AL in his December 5, 1998 letter to that office and that DOE/AL has failed to respond to these requests. We note that this Office does not have jurisdiction in cases where no appealable determination has been issued, as is the case here, and therefore we will not consider these issues. Where the department has failed to respond to requests in a timely manner, however, the Appellant does have the right to file a complaint with the appropriate federal district court. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), (6)(C). We have nevertheless discussed these two requests with DOE/AL and can give the Appellant some guidance.

In the first request, the Appellant stated that if his request for a fee waiver in connection with his August 4, 1998 request was denied again, he then wished to re-request all items mentioned in that previous request, in order to avail himself of another opportunity to show that he meets Factors C and D of the fee waiver test. As discussed above, the Appellant does not meet these factors and has had an adequate opportunity to show that he does meet them. His sole remaining remedy on the fee waiver issue is to proceed to federal court. We view the Appellant's December 5, 1998 request for all documents he previously requested in his August 4, 1998 request as purely a means for continuing to challenge the DOE's fee waiver determination and not in fact a new request for information. Thus, we believe that DOE/AL correctly refused to process that December 5, 1998 request.

In his other December 5, 1998 request, the Appellant sought all documents relating to his FOIA requests. DOE/AL has informed us that it will begin processing this request. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn L. Goldstein and Terry Apodaca (December 29, 1998).

In conclusion, we find that it was not erroneous for DOE/AL to administratively close the Appellant's August 4, 1998 FOIA request. We also find no reason to overturn our earlier Rockefeller decision. Further, we believe that DOE/AL correctly refused to begin processing the Appellant's new request for all documents he previously requested on August 4, 1998. Finally, DOE/AL has informed us that it will begin processing the Appellant's new FOIA request for documents relating to his FOIA requests. However, because OHA has no jurisdiction over those latter two issues, we will dismiss that portion of the Appeal. Consequently, the Appellant's appeal is being dismissed in part and denied in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Tod N. Rockefeller on December 22, 1998, Case Number VFA-0468, is hereby dismissed to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and is denied in all other respects.

(2) The portions of the Appeal filed in Case No. VFA-0468 concerning the Albuquerque Operations Office's failure to begin processing the two December 5, 1998 requests are hereby dismissed.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1) 1/ This regulation provides the following: "[w]hen the Authorizing Official has denied a request for records in whole or in part or has responded that there are no documents responsive to the request consistent with Section 1004.4(d), or when the Freedom of Information Officer has denied a request for waiver of fees consistent with Section 1004.9, the requester may, within 30 calendar days of its receipt, appeal the determination to the Office of Hearings and Appeals."

(2)We further note that DOE/AL had requested from the Appellant a partial advance payment of $1,500 in order to process the request. The payment was never made. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Dawn L. Goldstein, OHA Staff Attorney and Terry Apodaca, DOE/AL (December 30, 1998). This is a separate, equally valid reason for DOE/AL to administratively close the Appellant's August 4, 1998 request. Moreover, if the Appellant wishes to have the request reopened, DOE/AL would be entitled to obtain "an advance payment of an amount up to the full estimated charges" because the estimated fees in this case were greater than $250 and the Appellant apparently has no history of payment with the DOE. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.9(b)(8)(i).

(3) 3/ The Appellant also complained that DOE/AL failed to consider a Department of Labor whistleblower complaint that he had filed and considers relevant to his fee waiver request. We have examined this complaint and find that it contains no information relevant to the Appellant's ability to meet Factor C.

Case No. VFA-0469, 27 DOE ¶ 80,185

January 21, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: William E. Logan, Jr. & Associates

Date of Filing: January 4, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0469

William E. Logan, Jr., of the law firm William E. Logan, Jr., & Associates (Logan), files this Appeal pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (the Department) at 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

Logan sent a FOIA request to the Department's Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office (SPR) in New Orleans. In its request, Logan sought material dealing with lease and purchase agreements between Shell Pipeline Corporation and the Department. The agreements concerned the Bayou Choctaw crude oil pipeline and the St. James Terminal.

SPR released redacted copies of the agreements. In its determination letter accompanying the released documents, SPR informed Logan that it had withheld formula rates. With regard to the Bayou Choctaw and St. James Terminal lease agreements, SPR explained that:

The formula rates have been withheld because [they are] exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(4). Exemption 4 provides that an agency can withhold such data if it believes release would cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained or impair the Government's ability to obtain such information in the future.

Similarly, with regard to the purchase agreement concerning Bayou Choctaw, SPR released a redacted copy, stating that "portions of [the purchase agreement] contain formulas that are exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4)." SPR did not provide any further explanation of its decision to redact the documents. Logan then filed this Appeal, contending that "the formula rates which have been deleted are not exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act."

The FOIA generally requires that agency records held by a covered branch of the Federal Government, and which have not been made public in an authorized manner, be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). However, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9).

The exemption asserted in this case by SPR is found at 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4) (Exemption 4). Exemption 4 permits an agency to withhold from release "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." Thus, in applying Exemption 4, the withholding office must first determine whether the information either is a trade secret or is commercial or financial information.

If the agency determines the material is a trade secret for the purposes of the FOIA, its analysis is complete and the material may be withheld under Exemption 4. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. Food & Drug Admin., 704 F.2d 1280, 1286, 1288 (D.C. Cir. 1983).

However, if the agency determines the material is commercial or financial information, obtained from a person, and privileged or confidential, there is additional analysis the agency must undertake. First, the agency must decide whether the information was involuntarily or voluntarily submitted. If the information was voluntarily submitted, it may be withheld under Exemption 4 if the submitter would not customarily make such information available to the public. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Comm'n, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992). If it was involuntarily submitted, the information may be withheld under Exemption 4 if disclosure meets either prong of a two-pronged test. Under the first prong, the information may be withheld if disclosure is likely to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future. Under the second prong, the information may be withheld if disclosure is likely to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. National Parks and Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765, 770 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

As the descriptions indicate, these three standards are mutually exclusive. For purposes of Exemption 4, either information is voluntarily or involuntarily submitted commercial or financial information, or it is a trade secret.

In addition, once an agency decides to withhold information, both the FOIA and the Department's regulations require the agency to provide a reasonably specific justification for its withholding. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6), 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Kleppe, 547 F.2d 673 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (Kleppe); Digital City Communications, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,657 (1997); Data Technology Industries, 4 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1979). This allows both the requester and this Office to determine whether the claimed exemption was accurately applied. Tri-State Drilling, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,202 at 80,816 (1997). It also aids the requester in formulating a meaningful appeal and this Office in reviewing that appeal. Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, 22 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,517 (1992).

Thus, if an agency withholds material under Exemption 4 because its disclosure is likely to cause substantial competitive harm, it must state the reasons for believing such harm will result. Larson Associated, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,204 (1996); Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993). Conclusory and generalized allegations of substantial competitive harm, on the other hand, are unacceptable and cannot support an agency's decision to withhold requested documents. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. F.D.A., 704 F.2d 1280, 1291 (D.C.Cir. 1983); Kleppe, 547 F.2d at 680 ("conclusory and generalized allegations are indeed unacceptable as a means of sustaining the burden of nondisclosure under the FOIA").

The determination letter issued by SPR does not satisfy either the FOIA or the Department's regulations. As an initial matter, it does not explicitly state which of the three standards under Exemption 4 SPR applied in its decision to withhold the formula rates. Because the determination letter mentions the substantial competitive harm and impaired ability standards, it appears that SPR categorized the formula rates as involuntarily submitted commercial or financial information. However, SPR did not provide any explanation of how it arrived at this categorization. As a result, we cannot evaluate whether SPR applied the proper standard in withholding the formula rates. Furthermore, the determination letter provides no basis for the assertion that releasing the information would meet either prong of the test for involuntarily submitted commercial or financial information. Consequently, the determination letter does not permit either a meaningful appeal or an appropriate review.

We will therefore remand this matter to SPR to issue a new determination. That determination shall either release the formula rates or provide a new justification for withholding.(1) If SPR continues to withhold the formula rates under Exemption 4, it must explain which Exemption 4 test it is applying. In doing so, it must provide more than a simple restatement of the applicable test. Instead, it should include a statement of the reason for any withholding, and a brief explanation of how the exemption applies to the matter withheld. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1); William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,221 at 80,861 (1997); Davis Wright & Jones, 19 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,510 (1989). In making its determination, SPR may group similar documents together and provide one justification for each group of documents.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by William E. Logan, Jr. & Associates, OHA Case No. VFA-0469, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office, to issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)*/ In addition, the FOIA requires that "any reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (1982); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Air Force, 556 F.2d 242, 259-62 (D.C. Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 927 (1978*); EPA v. Mink*, 410 U.S. 73, 89, 91 (1973); Casson, Calligaro & Mutryn, 10 DOE ¶ 80,137 at 80,615 (1983). However, segregation and release of non-exempt material is not necessary where it is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material so that release of the non-exempt material would "compromise" the withheld material, or where the amount of non-exempt material is small and so interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate. *Lead Indus. Case No. VFA-0470, 27 DOE ¶ 80,189

February 26, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Ashok K. Kaushal

Date of Filing: January 22, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0470

On January 22, 1999, Ashok K. Kaushal filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on December 16, 1998, by the Office of Inspector General (IG) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination responded to a request for information he filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004 and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. Mr. Kaushal challenges the adequacy of IG's search for documents responsive to his request.

I. Background

On April 29, 1997, Mr. Kaushal filed a request for information in which he sought documents created in response to a complaint he filed against Sandia National Laboratory. On December 16, 1998, IG issued a determination which stated that it located a number of documents responsive to Mr. Kaushal's request. See Determination Letter at 1. IG released certain documents to Mr. Kaushal. However, it withheld other documents and portions thereof pursuant to Exemptions 5, 6 and 7(C) of the FOIA.

On January 22, 1999, Mr. Kaushal filed the present Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA). In his Appeal, Mr. Kaushal does not challenge the documents that were withheld pursuant to Exemptions 5, 6 and 7(C), but rather challenges the adequacy of the search that IG conducted. Specifically, Mr. Kaushal contends that IG failed to locate and provide a copy of the investigative report related to Mr. Kaushal's complaint. Mr. Kaushal asks that the OHA direct IG to conduct a new search for this investigative report. See Appeal Letter.

II. Analysis

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, agencies are required to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Hideca Petroleum Corp., 9 DOE ¶ 80,108 (1981); Charles Varon, 6 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1980). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further responsive documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was inadequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C.

Cir. 1982) (emphasis in original).

To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01, modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985). Furthermore, the determination of whether a search was reasonable is "dependent upon the circumstances of the case." Founding Church of Scientology v. National Security Agency, 610 F.2d 824, 834 (D.C. Cir. 1979).

In reviewing the present Appeal, we contacted officials at IG to ascertain the extent of the search that had been performed and to determine whether any other documents responsive to Mr. Kaushal's request might exist. Upon receiving Mr. Kaushal's request for information, IG instituted a search of its files. Specifically, IG searched its Allegation-Based Inspections Files. Based on this search, IG located a number of documents that were responsive to Mr. Kaushal's request. Some of these documents were provided to Mr. Kaushal in their entirety and others were provided with material withheld pursuant to Exemptions 5, 6 and 7(C). IG has informed us that this search did not produce the investigative report referred to in Mr. Kaushal's Appeal because Mr. Kaushal's complaint was settled before a report could be issued. See Record of Telephone Conversation Between Geoffrey Gray, IG, and Kimberly Jenkins-Chapman, OHA (February 9, 1999). According to IG, it is their policy to destroy any drafts of their investigative reports. However, upon a further search during the course of this Appeal, IG has located a number of additional documents that were used in drafting an investigative report.

Given the facts presented to us, we find that IG conducted an adequate search which was reasonably calculated to discover documents responsive to Mr. Kaushal's request. However, in light of the fact that IG has located additional documents that might be responsive to Mr. Kaushal's request, we shall remand this matter to IG to either release these documents to Mr. Kaushal or issue a new determination adequately supporting the withholding of the documents.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Ashok K. Kaushal, OHA Case No. VFA-0470, on January 22, 1999, is hereby granted in part as set forth below in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Energy, which shall either release additional responsive documents or issue a new determination adequately supporting the withholding of the documents.

in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Beech Grove Technology, Inc.

Date of Filing: January 11, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0471

This Decision and Order concerns an Appeal that Beech Grove Technology, Inc. (BGTI) filed from a determination issued to it by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Golden Field Office. In this determination, the Golden Office granted in part a request for information that BGTI filed pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require the Golden Office to conduct a further search for responsive materials.

In its request, BGTI sought access to all negative evaluations of its application under the DOE's Inventions and Innovations Program (Solicitation No. DE-PS36-98GO10293). In response to this request, the Golden Office provided BGTI with three "I&I Technical Review" worksheets. These worksheets consist of the comments of three evaluators concerning BGTI's application. In its Appeal, BGTI contests the adequacy of the search for responsive documents. (1)

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

In order to evaluate the adequacy of the search, we contacted the Golden Office. We were informed that three evaluations of BGTI's application were performed, and that all three were provided to BGTI. See memorandum of February 2, 1999 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA staff attorney, and Christopher Powers, Golden Field Office. We have examined these documents, and they appear to be complete. Moreover, BGTI has offered no additional information or evidence which would lead us to believe that other relevant documents exist. We therefore find that the search for responsive documents conducted by the Golden Office was adequate, and that BGTI's Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Beech Grove Technology, Inc. on January 11, 1999 is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)In its Appeal, BGTI also responds to the negative evaluations of its application, and requests that this response be placed in the company's file in the Golden Office. We have forwarded BGTI's Appeal to the Golden Office, which has informed us that it will grant this request.

Case No. VFA-0472, 27 DOE ¶ 80,191

March 10, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:City of Federal Way

Date of Filing:February 9, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0472

On February 9, 1999, the City of Federal Way, Washington, completed the filing of an Appeal from a determination issued to it in response to a request for documents submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Manager of Real Property Services and the Freedom of Information Act Officer (Authorizing Officials) of the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) issued the determination on November 9, 1998. This Appeal, if granted, would require that the Authorizing Officials release responsive information that was withheld under FOIA Exemptions 4 and 5, 5 U.S.C. §§ 552(b)(4) and (b)(5).

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE shall nonetheless release to the public a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On June 12, 1998, the City of Federal Way filed a request with the Bonneville Power Administration for copies of any and all leases, licenses or agreements, or any proposed leases, licenses or agreements between Western Wireless and the BPA within the State of Washington and between any telecommunication provider and the BPA within the State of Washington. The Manager of BPA's Real Property Services responded to this FOIA request in a July 29, 1998 letter and released some portions of documents, but withheld information pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA. On September 14, 1998, the City of Federal Way filed an appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals of the DOE (OHA). Following an inquiry by the OHA, the BPA requested that the OHA allow it to withdraw its determination so that it could issue a new determination concerning the City of Federal Way's FOIA request. On October 19, 1998, the OHA granted the BPA's request and allowed the BPA to issue a new determination within 20 working days. Finally, on November 9, 1998, the BPA issued a new determination withholding information pursuant to Exemptions 4 and 5 of the FOIA.

II. Analysis

In its Appeal, the City of Federal Way claims that the BPA incorrectly applied Exemptions 4 and 5 to responsive information. The City of Federal Way maintains that the Authorizing Officials did not identify the proposed lease documents the BPA withheld pursuant to Exemption 5, or explain how the exemption applies to the particular records and why discretionary release is not appropriate. The City of Federal Way also contends that improper ex parte communications between the OHA and the BPA staff, and the illegal withdrawal and reissuance of the BPA's determination, have "invalidated" the BPA's entire decision process. For these reasons, the City of Federal Way argues that the OHA must reverse the BPA's determination and disclose the withheld information.

Allegations of Improper Procedure

As an initial matter, we note that the OHA addressed the City of Federal Way's allegations regarding improper ex parte communications between the OHA and the BPA staff, and alleged illegal withdrawal and reissuance of the BPA's determination, in a November 4, 1998 letter from Thomas O. Mann, OHA Deputy Director, to Bob Sterbank, Deputy City Attorney for the City of Federal Way. In this letter, the OHA Deputy Director stated that the OHA's role in FOIA proceedings is not that of an appellate court reviewing the holding of a lower court, but is instead more informal. The OHA's responsibility in these cases is to ensure that FOIA determinations are properly done and are issued fully in accordance with both the letter and the spirit of the FOIA and the applicable DOE regulations. In fulfilling this responsibility, the OHA often performs a non-judicial function such as investigating the adequacy of a DOE Office's search for responsive documents and facilitating communications between a requester and the DOE Office that processed the request.

The City of Federal Way had claimed that the BPA is limited to "one bite at the apple" through the doctrine of "res judicata" and that this doctrine is made applicable to administrative agencies by Drummond v. Commissioner of Social Security, 126 F.3d 837, 840-41 (6th Cir. 1997) (Drummond) and similar cases. The City of Federal Way exaggerates the limitations imposed upon agencies by the doctrine of "res judicata." Agencies are always able and encouraged to correct mistakes. The OHA Deputy Director informed the City of Federal Way that, contrary to its argument, nothing in 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8 of the DOE FOIA regulations prohibits the OHA from allowing the BPA to withdraw its determination and issue a new one. Specifically, the OHA Deputy Director stated that Drummond is inapposite because that case involved a quasi-judicial, trial type administrative hearing, which is not the case here. The City of Federal Way's argument, if carried to its logical conclusion, would prevent an issuing Office from amending or replacing a defective determination letter, even if that letter was so vague as to make it impossible to identify the exemptions or the reasons for the actions taken. Nothing in the FOIA or the DOE regulations requires such a result. Furthermore, the OHA Deputy Director informed the City of Federal Way that the BPA has not waived its ability to rely in the future on any exemptions that it did not cite in the original determination. The federal courts have held that an agency's failure to raise a FOIA exemption at any level of the administrative process does not constitute a waiver of that defense. See, e.g., Young v. CIA, 972 F.2d 536, 538-39 (4th Cir. 1992); Frito-Lay v. EEOC, 964 F.Supp. 236, 239 (W.D. Ky. 1997). Thus, nothing in the DOE regulations or in the applicable case law precludes the withdrawal of a determination letter and the issuance of a new one.

Finally, unlike other areas of OHA jurisdiction (e.g. personnel security and "whistleblower" proceedings, which are quasi-judicial in nature) there are no provisions in the DOE's FOIA regulations prohibiting ex parte contacts. Moreover, our experience confirms that communication with the DOE office issuing the determination often proves critical to our ability to investigate the process underlying that determination and to reach the correct result following an appeal. Accordingly, for all of the reasons stated above, we again find no merit in the City of Federal Way's contention that improper procedures require the OHA to reverse the BPA's determination.

The Documents Withheld Pursuant to Exemption 4

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or

(2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n. v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provided to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879.

In appropriate cases, Exemption 4 protects the release of the type of information the requester seeks. We have reviewed the redacted information and find that it contains rates and charges negotiated for lease agreements between the BPA and Western Wireless. These negotiated rates and charges are confidential commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. The DOE obtained this material from a "person" as Exemption 4 requires, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). In this case, once the BPA began negotiations with Western Wireless, the firm involuntarily submitted information to the BPA since a requirement of completing the lease agreement was Western Wireless's submission of rates and charges it was willing to pay. See March 2, 1999 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, and Sonya Baskerville, BPA Attorney. Thus, the information Western Wireless submitted is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. We conclude that the charges and rates are confidential because their release would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. A competitor could use the release of these lease terms to easily determine how to adjust its proposed payments to offer more favorable terms than the submitter in an attempt to obtain another lease agreement with the federal government. Moreover, release of these lease terms would provide a competitor with detailed information revealing the submitter's financial position in its negotiations with the federal government.

The Documents Withheld Pursuant to Exemption 5

As stated above, the City of Federal Way maintains that the Authorizing Officials did not identify the proposed lease documents the BPA withheld pursuant to Exemption 5, or explain how the exemption applies to the particular records and why discretionary release is not appropriate. We have consistently held that the FOIA requires the authorizing official give reasonably informative descriptions of the documents or portions of documents being withheld that are sufficient to allow the requester to understand the determination and if appropriate to formulate a meaningful appeal. See, e.g., Klickitat Energy Partners, 25 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1995); Arnold & Porter, 12 DOE ¶ 80,108 at 80,527 (1984); Exxon Co., USA, 5 DOE ¶ 80,178 at 80,813 (1980); Cities Service Co., 5 DOE ¶ 80,101 at 80,502 (1980). Descriptions are generally adequate if each document is identified by a brief description of the subject matter it discusses and "if available, the date each document was produced [and] its authors and recipients. . . ." Klickitat Energy Partners, 25 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1995); Petroleum Delivery Service, 5 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1980). We have indicated that the "brief description" requirement is generally satisfied if sufficiently informative titles of the withheld documents are provided and that the descriptions need not contain factual information that would compromise the privileged nature of the documents. Klickitat Energy Partners, 25 DOE ¶ 80,132 (1995); P.A. Barnes, 5 DOE ¶ 80,112 at 80,538 (1980); Akin Gump, Hauer & Feld, 3 DOE ¶ 80,155 at 90,765 (1979).

In the determination letter, the Authorizing Officials cited Exemption 5 as the basis for withholding "'any and all' proposed licenses that BPA is planning to execute in the future with 'any telecommunication provider'. . . ." The BPA did not elaborate any further than this statement regarding its application of Exemption 5 to specific documents. We find that applying Exemption 5 to "proposed licenses that BPA is planning to execute" does not provide an adequate description of the documents or portions of documents being withheld sufficient to allow the requester to understand the determination and if appropriate to formulate a meaningful appeal. Accordingly, we must remand this determination to the Authorizing Officials for a more informative description of each proposed license the BPA withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. The BPA must specifically identify each proposed license it withheld in November of 1998 with an informative title.

III. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. We have determined that Exemption 4 requires the continued withholding of negotiated rates and charges between the BPA and Western Wireless. However, in cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4. Furthermore, since it is not possible for us to determine at this time which documents the BPA withheld pursuant to Exemption 5, we are not currently able to make a public interest determination concerning those documents.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal the City of Federal Way filed on February 9, 1999, Case No. VFA-0472, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Act Officer of the Bonneville Power Administration of the Department of Energy for a reasonably informative description of the documents being withheld pursuant to Exemption 5 sufficient to allow the City of Federal Way to understand the BPA's November 9, 1998 determination.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Motion for Reconsideration

Name of Petitioner: Matthew Cherney, M.D.

Date of Filing:January 28, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0473

On January 28, 1999, Matthew Cherney, M.D., filed a Motion for Reconsideration of a Decision and Order that the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued on January 19, 1999. The January 19 Decision and Order considered Dr. Cherney's Appeal of determinations issued on July 24, 1998, and September 18, 1998, by the Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy (DOE/EE). The determinations responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. For the reasons detailed below, we will deny Dr. Cherney's motion.

I. Background

Dr. Cherney requested from the DOE all documents related to an unsolicited proposal he had submitted to the DOE. The proposal concerned a system for collecting solar energy that Dr. Cherney invented. Dr. Cherney's FOIA request specified the following categories of documents relating to the proposal:

(1) All documents received by DOE and given consideration;

(2) All written comments from evaluators (and any calculations): Hoffman, Galdo, Muhs, Rajic, Simpson, Schaffhauser;

(3) All comments from any other evaluators;

(4) Transcripts of any oral comments made by any evaluator;

(5) Any other documents in the file; and

(6) Any electronic communications or telephone recordings.

On July 24, 1998, DOE/EE issued a partial response to the Dr. Cherney's request in which it released copies of 26 responsive documents. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Dr. Matthew Cherney, Sunbear

Systems (July 24, 1998). DOE/EE issued another partial response on September 18, 1998. In that determination, DOE/EE released additional documents in their entirety, released four other documents with information redacted from them, and identified 31 documents that it was withholding in their entirety. DOE/EE stated that the information it was withholding was exempt from disclosure under Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems (September 18, 1998).

In considering Dr. Cherney's Appeal, we reviewed the 35 documents that DOE/EE withheld from him, either in part or in their entirety, in its September 18, 1998 determination. These documents were specifically identified in an “Index of Released Documents” and an “Index of Documents Not Released” DOE/EE provided to Dr. Cherney with the September 18, 1998 determination letter. A copy of these indices can be found in the Appendix to this Decision and Order. We reviewed all of the 31 documents listed in the “Index of Documents Not Released.” We also reviewed four documents listed in the “Index of Released Documents” that were withheld from Dr. Cherney in part.

In our January 19, 1999 Decision and Order, we found that DOE/EE properly withheld in part the four documents listed in the “Index of Released Documents.” Of the 31 documents listed in the “Index of Documents Not Released” we found as follows. DOE/EE properly withheld information in the 13 documents responsive to Dr. Cherney's request for “All written comments from evaluators (and any calculations): Hoffman, Galdo, Muhs, Rajic, Simpson, Schaffhauser.” However, we found that a portion of the material in two of these 13 documents (nos. 7 and 8) “can be released to Dr. Cherney without compromising the material withheld or imposing an inordinate burden on DOE/EE.” January 19, 1999 Decision and Order at 5. With respect to the 18 documents withheld in their entirety in response to Dr. Cherney's request for “Any other documents in the file” and “Any electronic communications or telephone recordings,” we found that DOE/EE may not withhold these documents in their entirety under FOIA Exemption 5. Id. at 6.

II. Analysis

Dr. Cherney's first argument in his Motion for Reconsideration concerns the documents that we found in our January 19, 1999 Decision and Order were properly withheld by DOE/EE under FOIA Exemption 5. Dr. Cherney contends that he was “told in writing” that these documents “did not even exist, . . .” Motion for Reconsideration at 1. In a letter submitted after he filed his Motion for Reconsideration, Dr. Cherney posits that the documents “never existed” or “do not exist at all and were 'invented'” by our office. Letter from Matthew Cherney, M.D., to George Breznay, Director, Office of Hearings and Appeals (January 26, 1999). Dr. Cherney asserts in the alternative that the documents provided to our office in the course of reviewing his Appeal “amount[] to back-dated fraudulent material.” Motion for Reconsideration at 1.

We find these contentions puzzling, because on December 9, 1998, Dr. Cherney provided us with the September 18, 1998 determination letter he received from DOE/EE, along with the two indices of documents we refer to above. These indices quite explicitly informed Dr. Cherney what documents did exist, and as we stated above, each document we found in our Decision and Order to be exempt from withholding under Exemption 5 was specifically identified in these indices. Thus, Dr. Cherney's contentions that he was not made aware of the existence of the documents we reviewed, or that they were “invented” after he filed his Appeal, have no factual basis. Moreover, in reviewing these documents, we found no evidence of alteration, nor is there any other extrinsic or intrinsic evidence to support his claim. Without even a shred of evidence to support Dr. Cherney's assertion that the documents were “back-dated” or “fraudulent,” we cannot blithely accept it as fact.

Second, Dr. Cherney takes issue with the statement in our Decision and Order that “while exposure of unlawful conduct on the part of government officials would clearly further the public interest, the information we have found was properly withheld evidences, on its face, no illegal activity of any kind.” Id. (emphasis added). Dr. Cherney contends that because we see no evidence of illegal activity, we are “intimating that the material . . . was in fact exculpatory.” Motion for Reconsideration at 1. Regardless of any inferences Dr. Cherney may choose to draw from the text of our Decision and Order, we merely stated in that Decision, as we do now, that we could find no evidence of fraud or illegal activity of any kind in the documents we reviewed. Dr. Cherney offers us nothing in his Motion for Reconsideration that would alter that fact. Accordingly, the present Motion for Reconsideration will be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Motion for Reconsideration filed by Matthew Cherney, M.D., on January 28, 1999, Case Number VFA-0473, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Louthian & Louthian

Date of Filings: February 2, 1999

Case Numbers: VFA-0474

On February 2, 1999, the law firm of Louthian & Louthian (Louthian) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that DOE's Savannah River Operations Office (SR) issued to Louthian on January 25, 1999. The determination concerned a request for information that Louthian submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would result in the release of any existing responsive material to Louthian.

I. Background

On November 19, 1998, Louthian filed a FOIA request with DOE/SR, seeking: (1) copies of the computer-generated list of salaried professional employees used by management at SR prior to a 1997 layoff, (2) a list of employees being considered by management for the 1997 layoff in 1996, and (3) the list of employees being considered for layoff on January 10, 1997, and January 15-17, 1997. In a determination letter, SR responded that DOE did not possess or own responsive documents. Letter from SR to Louthian (January 25, 1999). Rather, the records requested were "employment- related records" of Westinghouse Savannah River Company (WSRC), the management and operating contractor of SR. Id. Louthian appealed this determination, asserting that the requested records should be considered agency records because the information is readily available to DOE from WSRC. Letter from Louthian to OHA (February 2, 1999) (Appeal).

II. Analysis

Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether the material requested can be considered "agency records" and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f) (describing the scope of the term "agency" under the FOIA). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the records in question are not "agency records" and that they are also not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as WSRC, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 27 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1998); BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595.

A. WSRC Is Not An Agency Under the FOIA

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government-controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552 (f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the federal government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. V. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Under its contractual relationship with DOE, WSRC is the contractor responsible for maintaining and operating SR. See Memorandum from Jim Durkis, SR, to Valerie Vance Adeyeye (February 2, 1999). While DOE obtained WSRC's services and exercises general control over the contract work, it does not supervise the day-to-day operations of WSRC. Electronic Mail Message from Pauline Conner, SR, to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, Staff Attorney, OHA (February 11, 1999). We therefore conclude that WSRC cannot be considered an "agency" subject to the FOIA.

B. The Records Were Not Within DOE's Control At The Time Of Request

Although WSRC is not an agency for the purpose of the FOIA, its records relevant to Louthian's request could become "agency records" if DOE obtained them and they were within DOE's control at the time Louthian made its FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989); see Kissinger v. Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, SR has informed us that the information that Louthian seeks was not in the agency's control at the time of the appellant's request. See Electronic Mail Message from Pauline Conner, SR to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (February 11, 1999). Based on these facts, the responsive documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

C. The Contract Provides That Employment-Related Records Are Contractor Property

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between DOE and the contractor provides that they are the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the government, DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e)(1).

We next look to the contract between DOE and WSRC to determine the status of the requested records. The contract provides that all records “acquired or generated” by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of DOE "[e]xcept as provided in paragraph b . . . . " Contract DE-AC09-96SR18500 (October 1, 1996), Section H.27, Paragraph (a). See also International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 27 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1998). Paragraph (b) of the DOE-SR contract states that employment-related records are considered the property of the Contractor, including personnel records and similar files. Because the documents at issue are related to employment issues at WSRC, we find that the requested records are not agency records and thus not subject to release under DOE regulations.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on February 2, 1999 by Louthian & Louthian, OHA Case No. VFA-0474, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Michael J. Ravnitzky

Date of Filing: February 5, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0475

Michael J. Ravnitzky filed an Appeal from a determination that the Department of Energy's FOIA/Privacy Act Division (FOI/PA) issued to him on January 19, 1999. In that determination, FOI/PA denied in part a request for information that Mr. Ravnitzky filed with the Federal Bureau of Investigation on April 20, 1994, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. This Appeal, if granted, would require the Department of Energy (DOE) to release the information that was withheld in the January 19 determination.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In his request, Mr. Ravnitzky sought FBI records concerning Bob Considine, a syndicated reporter whose work appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer, among other newspapers. The FBI identified, among the documents responsive to this request, two letters that originated at the Atomic Energy Commission, a predecessor agency to the DOE. Because these letters were marked as containing classified information, the FBI referred them to the DOE for review, in July 1998. The DOE's Office of Declassification (OD) determined that one of the two letters was unclassified and could be released. OD determined, however, that the other letter, dated April 11, 1962, contained some classified information, which was identified and redacted from the copy released to Mr. Ravnitzky on January 19, 1999, together with a full copy of the first letter. FOI/PA stated in its January 19 letter that the deleted information was withheld under Exemption 1 of the FOIA, because it concerned military plans, weapons systems, or operations that are classified as National Security Information under Section 1.5(a) of Executive Order 12958.

In his Appeal, Mr. Ravnitzky contends that the withheld information is not properly classified, that some portions of the withheld information may be segregated from any properly classified portion and released, and that this information is more than 35 years old.

II. Analysis

Exemption 1 of the FOIA provides that an agency may exempt from disclosure matters that are "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1). Executive Order 12958 is the current Executive Order that provides for the classification, declassification and safeguarding of national security information. When properly classified under this Executive Order, national security information is exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 1. See National Security Archive, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Keith E. Loomis, 25 DOE ¶ 80,183 (1996); A. Victorian, 25 DOE ¶ 80,166 (1996).

The Director of Security Affairs (SA) has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this Appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of SA reviewed all materials for which the DOE had claimed an exemption from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA. The Director of SA has now concluded that the document no longer contains any information that needs to remain classified by the DOE. Accordingly, Mr. Ravnitzky's Appeal will be granted and the withheld information will be provided to the appellant under separate cover.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Michael J. Ravnitzky on February 5, 1999, Case No. VFA-0475, is hereby granted.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:John L. Gretencord

Date of Filing: February 16, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0476

On February 16, 1999, the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) received a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) Appeal filed by John L. Gretencord. Gretencord is appealing a determination by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Ohio Field Office (Ohio). Ohio issued a determination on December 15, 1998, in response to a request for information submitted in accordance with the provisions of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would require DOE to conduct a further search for responsive materials and to release additional information to Gretencord.

I. Background

The present appeal appears before this office under somewhat unusual circumstances. The Appellant, Mr. Gretencord, is a former employee of a DOE contractor, West Valley Nuclear Services, Inc. (WVN). While he was employed by WVN at a DOE site, Gretencord apparently contacted DOE officials on several occasions to report his safety concerns. Gretencord's safety concerns were investigated by Ohio, which supervises the operations conducted on the DOE's behalf by WVN. Gretencord's employment was subsequently terminated by WVN. Gretencord, contending that his termination resulted from reporting his safety concerns to DOE, filed a whistleblower complaint with the DOE under 10 C.F.R. Part 708. Gretencord's whistleblower allegations were investigated by DOE's Office of Inspector General (the IG).

Gretencord also wrote his local member of Congress requesting intervention on his behalf "regarding the safety concerns investigation over the DOE-WVDP nuclear facility." Specifically, Gretencord sought to "review the investigation documentation and evidence." A member of the Congressman's staff referred Gretencord's request to the IG. The IG then referred the request to Ohio, requesting that it be processed under the FOIA. On December 15, 1998, Ohio issued a determination letter in which it released the contents of its file on the investigation of Gretencord's safety concerns to him. However, Ohio withheld portions of one document contained in the investigation file under the deliberative process privilege of Exemption 5. In addition, Ohio withheld the identities of several individuals under Exemption 6.

In his Appeal, Gretencord does not contest Ohio's withholdings under Exemption 6. However, he contests the adequacy of the search for documents responsive to his request and Ohio's withholdings under Exemption 5.

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of the Search

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord, Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

Gretencord contends that the DOE should have searched the IG's files as well as Ohio's files. We agree. Initially, we note that the scope of Gretencord's request is somewhat ambiguous. On one hand, he refers to "[t]he safety concerns investigation over the [WVN] facility," while on the other hand he discusses his attempts to contact the IG and his whistleblower claims. Under circumstances where a request is ambiguous in nature, the DOE's FOIA regulations require the DOE to "invite the requester to confer with knowledgeable DOE personnel in an attempt to restate the request." 10 C.F.R. 1004.4(c)(2). Therefore, the IG should have contacted Gretencord to clarify the scope of his request instead of assuming that Gretencord sought only information concerning the investigation of his safety concerns. On appeal, Gretencord indicates that he intended to obtain information concerning the whistleblower investigation as well the safety investigation. Had the IG consulted with Gretencord, we believe he would have been able to clarify that he was also interested in the files of the whistleblower investigation. Accordingly, we are remanding this portion of the present appeal to the IG. On remand, the IG should conduct a new search of its files for all information generated as a result of its investigation into his whistleblower allegations. Upon completion of this search, the IG should issue a determination to Gretencord explaining its results.

B. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter- agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that Exemption 5 incorporates those “privileges which the Government enjoys under the relevant statutory and case law in the pre-trial discovery context.” Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184 (1975); see also NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). Among the privileges that fall under this exclusion is the executive or deliberative process privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980). The deliberative process privilege permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The purpose of the privilege is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for the deliberative process to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give- and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

After reviewing the information that Ohio withheld under Exemption 5, we find that it was properly withheld under Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege. The withheld information consists of portions of a report entitled "QA Paradigm Team Draft Findings." This document is a draft of a self-improvement team's tentative conclusions concerning WVN's Quality Assurance program. Because it is clearly a draft and is obviously recommendatory in nature, it is predecisional. Moreover, since it consists purely of opinion, it is clearly deliberative.

Release of this information could reasonably be expected to chill the agency's deliberative process. It is doubtful that the report's authors and sources would have provided the frank opinions contained in the report if they thought their opinions would be subjected to public release. The candid and frank exchange of ideas is critically important to the proper functioning of the agency. Because the public release of such candid and frank opinions could reasonably be expected to cause agency employees to become less frank and candid in the future, we find that releasing the withheld information would be contrary to the public interest. Accordingly, we find that Ohio's withholdings under Exemption 5 were proper.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, we find that the IG should conduct an additional search for responsive documents. In addition, we find that Ohio's withholdings under Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege were proper.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by John L. Gretencord on February 16, 1999, Case Number VFA-0476, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph (2) and denied in all other aspects.

(2) The portion of the Appeal concerning the search for responsive documents is hereby remanded to the Office of Inspector General with instructions to conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's request in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0477, 27 DOE ¶ 80,193

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Puget Sound Energy, Inc.

Date of Filing: February 12, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0477

On February 12, 1999, Puget Sound Energy, Inc. (PSE) filed an Appeal from a final determination that the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA) issued on January 28, 1999.(1)In its determination, BPA released a number of documents in their entirety but withheld portions of four documents and withheld in their entirety 17 other documents that were responsive to a request for information that PSE filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

I. BACKGROUND

In a request for information dated December 11, 1998 (Request), PSE sought:

(1) Documents pertaining to changes to electric transmission facilities relating to ARCO (a private firm), Whatcom County Public Utility District #1 (Whatcom County PUD), or any other entity in Whatcom County. (2)

(2) Agreements (or drafts) between the PUD and BPA relating to transmission and sale of electric power, including Agreement Number 97TX30078.

(3) A copy of the Whatcom County New Load Addition Preliminary System Impact Study (or similar documents) and all drafts of these documents.

(4) Any agreements (or drafts) concerning transmission capacity between BPA and Intalco (a private firm).

(5) Documents relating to a specified BPA memorandum outlining a new BPA transmission project to by-pass PSE's transmission system in Whatcom County for the benefit of ARCO.

In a January 28, 1999 determination letter (Determination Letter), BPA released a number of documents in their entirety and provided PSE with a list of 21 documents that it was withholding in part or in whole. The Determination Letter provided redacted copies of four documents (Documents Nos. 4, 9, 10, and 19). The remaining 17 documents were withheld in their entirety. Information in Documents Nos. 8, 9 and 10 was withheld pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA. Specifically, BPA asserted that the withheld information consisted of confidential commercial information whose release would cause competitive harm to Whatcom County PUD. Documents Nos. 1-4, 6-7, 11-21 contained information that was withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. BPA asserted that the material withheld from these documents consisted of predecisional analyses by BPA staff members that are protected from mandatory disclosure by the deliberative process privilege. All of Document No. 5 and portions of Document No. 6 were also withheld under Exemption 5's attorney-client privilege. BPA stated that the material withheld in these documents consisted of confidential legal opinions. The Determination Letter also stated that portions of Document No. 7 contained information prepared in anticipation of an administrative rate hearing and thus, was protected by Exception 5's attorney work product privilege.

In its submission, PSE asserts numerous specific grounds for its Appeal. In general, PSE challenges the extent of the search that BPA conducted for responsive documents. Additionally, PSE challenges BPA's application of Exemptions 4 and 5 to the documents listed in the Determination Letter. (3)

II. ANALYSIS

As described below, after examining the documents in question, we believe that much of the withheld material was properly withheld pursuant to Exemptions 4 and 5. However, we also find that some of the withheld material was improperly withheld, under the rationale stated in BPA's Determination Letter. Additionally, BPA failed to segregate exempt material from the documents. Consequently, for the reasons stated below we will remand this matter to BPA. On remand, BPA shall either release the material described below or issue another determination detailing under what FOIA exemption it seeks to withhold the material.

A. Adequacy of the Search

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993); Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

BPA informed us that upon receipt of PSE's FOIA request, the account executive of the BPA team working on the proposed new electricity transmission project was asked to conduct a search for responsive documents. This official searched his office and then asked each of the members of his team to search for responsive documents. All documents related to that inquiry were forwarded or identified to PSE. The official was also aware of an 1996 inquiry regarding a similar project. The account executive then asked BPA employees involved with that inquiry about the existence of responsive documents. All responsive documents were either forwarded or identified to PSE. BPA officials were not aware of any other location at BPA that would contain responsive records. See Memorandum of telephone conversation between Susan Millar, Esq., and Carol Jacobson, Office of Chief Counsel, BPA, and Richard Cronin, OHA Staff Attorney (February 25, 1999).

PSE argues that BPA's search was inadequate. Specifically, PSE asserts that given the "size, cost and unusual nature of the proposed new transmission project," BPA should have discovered many more documents. See February 12, 1999 Appeal Letter from William R. Mauer, Perkins Coie, LLP, at 3 n.1. PSE also argues that it was not provided any documents regarding the sale of electric power. In response, BPA asserts that it does not have a policy that requires the retention of meeting notes or notes from telephone conversations. In this connection, BPA also maintains that many of the meetings regarding the proposed project were held "face to face" and thus no documents were generated. BPA notes that the proposed project is still in the preliminary stage and that no construction agreement has been reached with Whatcom County PUD. With regard to "sale of power" documents, BPA states that it has recently responded to PSE's request for such documents through a February 24, 1999 response to a subsequent PSE FOIA Request.

As to documents pertaining to the new transmission project, we believe BPA conducted an adequate search. BPA contacted the official whose team was responsible for the proposed project and that official had a search conducted in the offices of each of the individuals working on that project. Aside from the offices of the team's personnel, BPA was not aware of any location where responsive documents would exist. Further, given BPA's explanation as to how it conducted business regarding the proposed new project and the status of the proposed project, we cannot say that the number of documents discovered tends to show that BPA did not conduct an adequate search. Consequently, we believe that BPA conducted an adequate search for responsive documents regarding the proposed new transmission project. With regard to the search for "sale of power" documents, PSE may file an appeal regarding the adequacy of the search for these documents upon receipt of BPA's determination regarding the other PSE FOIA Request.

B. Exemption 4

Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." (4) National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765, 766 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871 (D.C. Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provides to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public. Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879. BPA withheld portions of Documents Nos. 9 and 10 and Document No. 8 in its entirety pursuant to Exemption 4.

Even if portions of the documents at issue in this Appeal meet the criteria cited above for applying Exemption 4 or any other Exemption, that does not mean that they may be withheld in their entirety. The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt under this subsection." See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10; Boulder Scientific Co., 19 DOE ¶ 80,126 at 80,577 (1989). In the context of Exemption 4, this means that the non-confidential information in documents should be released to the requester. The only exceptions to the requirement of segregation are where exempt and non-exempt material are so "inextricably intertwined" that release of the non-exempt material would compromise the exempt material, Lead Industries Ass'n v. OSHA, 610 F.2d 70, 85 (2d Cir. 1979), or where non-exempt material is so small and interspersed with exempt material that it would pose "an inordinate burden" to segregate it. Id. at 86; Neufeld v. IRS, 646 F.2d 661, 666 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

Document No. 8 is a letter from the Whatcom County PUD soliciting a study by BPA regarding needed electric transmission options for potential new customers of Whatcom County PUD. The letter contains information about these potential new customers and Whatcom County PUD's preliminary ideas of how best to service these customers. Document No. 8 thus contains commercial information obtained from a person. The commercial information in Document No. 8 was submitted voluntarily to BPA. Consequently, this information can only be considered confidential if it is not information Whatcom County PUD would customarily make available to the public. We note that, in the letter, Whatcom County PUD itself requested confidential treatment of the content of the letter. Whatcom County PUD subsequently informed BPA that release of the information in Document No. 8, as well as Document Nos. 9 and 10, would reveal its business strategy in providing power to its customers and would cause it competitive harm. Given this background, we believe that Whatcom County PUD would not normally make the information in Document No. 8 available to the public. Consequently we believe that the commercial information in this Document is confidential. However, while most of the withheld information was properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 4, there is some segregable non-commercial information that is not withholdable under Exemption 4. Specifically, the address block, greeting line and the first sentence of the first paragraph of the letter contain segregable information. Additionally, the first and last sentences of the last paragraph of the letter, the signature block and the "cc" line contain segregable, non-commercial information that is not withholdable under Exemption 4.

Document No. 9 is an agreement between BPA and Whatcom County PUD in which BPA agrees to conduct a study regarding a proposed project involving the feasibility of new interconnections for the transmission of electricity in a certain area. The only information withheld in this document is the information regarding the proposed changes to the electrical transmission system in a specific area. We find that this information is commercial since it relates to Whatcom County PUD's plans for providing electric power to its customers. Further, this information was obtained by a person. This information was obtained involuntarily since Whatcom County PUD was required to put this information in the agreement. Consequently, such information is confidential only if its disclosure would either (1) impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. See National Parks, 498 F.2d at 770. We believe that release of the withheld information in this document would cause competitive harm to Whatcom County PUD. BPA has informed us that electric energy markets in the Pacific Northwest have become highly competitive and that it believes that release of the information could impair Whatcom County PUD's ability to compete in this market. We believe that competitors could gain a commercial advantage if they could find out details concerning where and how Whatcom County PUD sought to add extra electric load capacity. Thus, we believe that the information withheld in Document No. 9 is confidential commercial information that was properly withheld under Exemption 4.

Document No. 10 is Whatcom County PUD's application for electric transmission service to obtain interconnection facilities to obtain two new points of delivery for electricity. The only information withheld in this document was a table entitled "10 Year Monthly Electric Load Forecast-Year 2000 Loads" (Forecast) that Whatcom County PUD provided with its application. (5) The withheld information is commercial and was supplied by a person. Document No. 10 was submitted pursuant to a formal request for transmission services and thus was not voluntarily provided. Applying the National Parks analysis, we believe that release of the Forecast would cause competitive harm to Whatcom County PUD. Release of the Forecast would give competitors significant insight into Whatcom County PUD's future business strategy and thus cause substantial harm to the competitive position of Whatcom County PUD. Consequently, we believe that the withheld information is confidential and properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 4. However, there is some segregable, non- commercial information consisting of the title and column table headings in the Forecast that may not be protected by Exemption 4.

PSE argues that the information BPA withheld under Exemption 4 is not confidential because BPA has not met the agency's burden of proof to establish that the withheld information is "confidential." PSE apparently defines "confidential" as information that is not known to other companies or people. PSE's definition is at odds with the meaning of "confidential," for Exemption 4 purposes, as defined by the courts. See supra. PSE's arguments notwithstanding, we believe that the information BPA has provided us, along with the very nature of the withheld information, allow us to conclude that most of the information withheld pursuant to Exemption 4 in Documents Nos. 8, 9, and 10 is confidential commercial information and was properly protected pursuant to Exemption 4.

C. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified several traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion, such as: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). All of these privileges are at issue in the present case.

1. Attorney-Client and Attorney Work Product Privileges

The attorney-client and the attorney work product privileges are frequently confused with each other. The attorney-client privilege exists to protect confidential communications between attorneys and their clients made for the purpose of securing or providing legal advice. In Re Grand Jury Proceedings 88-9 (MIA), 899 F.2d 1039 (11th Cir. 1990); In Re Grand Jury Subpoena of Slaughter, 694 F.2d 1258, 1260 (11th Cir. 1982). Not all communications between attorney and client are privileged, however. Clarke v. American Commerce National Bank, 974 F.2d 127 (9th Cir. 1992) (Clark). The courts have limited the protection of the privilege to those disclosures necessary to obtain or provide legal advice. Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391, 403 (1976). In other words, the privilege does not extend to social, informational, or procedural communications between attorney and client.

The attorney work product privilege protects from disclosure documents that reveal “the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions, or legal theories of an attorney or other representative of a party concerning the litigation.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3); see also Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 511 (1947). This privilege is also limited. It does not extend to every written document generated by an attorney. In order to be afforded protection under the attorney work product privilege, a document must have been prepared either for trial or in anticipation of litigation. See, e.g., Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 865.

Documents Nos. 5 and 6 were withheld pursuant to the attorney-client privilege. Document No. 5 is a BPA Office of General Counsel memorandum outlining the potential legal consequences of a certain proposed business transaction between BPA and Whatcom County PUD. Its purpose is to provide legal advice to BPA decision makers regarding the proposed transaction. Consequently, we believe that the entire document should be protected by Exemption 5's attorney-client privilege. Document No. 6 is a compilation of six electronic mail (e-mail) messages sent between various BPA employees. Two of the six messages are marked "attorney-client confidential information" and are dated April 28, 1995 and May 1, 1995. (6)While BPA has not specifically indicated which sections of this document were withheld pursuant to which privilege, we will assume that the two e-mail messages marked "attorney-client confidential information" were withheld pursuant to the attorney- client privilege. The April 28, 1995 message is an e-mail from an attorney at BPA's Office of Chief Counsel generally summarizing legal precedent regarding a particular type of transaction and asking for additional details regarding the transaction as well as requesting further consultation regarding a potential legal issue. The May 1, 1995 message is from a BPA attorney, requests information about a proposed project, and offers a tentative legal opinion regarding the project. Both e-mail messages were sent to obtain and provide legal advice regarding the proposed transaction and as such are properly protected by the attorney-client privilege. However, the e-mail headings for each of these e-mails and the first paragraph of the May 1, 1995 e-mail message consist of segregable, non- confidential material that, on remand, should be either provided to PSE or withheld pursuant to another determination outlining under which FOIA exemption the material is being withheld.

PSE challenges the application of attorney-client privilege to Documents Nos. 5 and 6 asserting that, to the extent that these messages contain information provided by a third party, that information is not protected by the privilege. PSE cites Schlefer v. United States, 702 F.2d 233, 245 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (Schlefer), as support for this proposition. We disagree with PSE's assertion and find PSE's reliance on Schlefer misplaced. In Schlefer, the Chief Counsel of the Maritime Administration had issued memorandum opinions regarding fact situations provided by outside applicants seeking a ruling on agency loans or similar benefits. Because neither the third-party factual information nor the agency officials' communications transmitting the information to the Chief Counsel concerned confidential information concerning the agency itself, the Court held that attorney-client privilege did not apply. Schlefer, 702 F.2d at 245. Thus, Schlefer does not hold that material obtained from third parties can never be protected by attorney-client privilege; instead Schlefer holds that such information may not be protected by attorney-client privilege unless it is part of an agency communication containing confidential information about the agency itself. See id. ("The outsider's communications to the [agency] official do not contain any confidential information concerning the Agency; when the official transmits the relevant facts to the Chief Counsel, no new or confidential information concerning the Agency is imparted."); Tax Analysts v. Internal Revenue Service, 117 F.3d 607, 619 (D.C. Cir 1997) (TA). One must keep in mind when considering the BPA in the FOIA context that BPA is a commercial enterprise. See supra note 1. The communications in Documents Nos. 5 and 6 involve BPA officials seeking legal advice on BPA's behalf regarding a proposed project involving the BPA's participation as an entity. Consequently, even if BPA in these communications used factual material obtained from third-parties, the material in Documents Nos. 5 and 6 contains confidential information about BPA and thus is protected by attorney-client privilege. See TA, 117 F.3d at 620 (agency communications containing both third-party information and confidential information is protectable by attorney-client privilege); see also Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 863 (when government is dealing with its attorneys as would any private party seeking advice to protect personal interests, it needs assurance of confidentiality so it will not be deterred from full and frank communications with its counsel).

Document No. 7 is a document containing a summary of a proposed BPA power sale to Whatcom County PUD and a private firm. The document also contains notes as to factual issues about which the author inquired as well as comments regarding a potential procedural issue. BPA asserts that this document was prepared in anticipation of a challenge to a potential cost allocation proposal in BPA's 1996 administrative rate hearing and, as such, it is protected by the deliberative process and attorney work product privileges. However, BPA failed to indicate, and it is unclear to us, which privilege applies to which portions of the document. Consequently, on remand, BPA should issue another determination regarding Document No. 7 that specifies which portions of the document are being withheld pursuant to which specific Exemption 5 privilege.

2. Deliberative Process Privilege

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, the document must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077-78 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

PSE argues that BPA has not definitively established the predecisional character of the documents it withheld pursuant to the deliberative process privilege. It goes on to argue that BPA's response does not establish the date the relevant decision was made, the nature of the process about which the predecisional deliberations occurred, the ultimate decision the documents lead up to, and whether any portions of the documents reflect the decision-making process. (7) We need not conduct an exhaustive inquiry of this particular information. Instead, we believe that we have obtained sufficient information from BPA to understand fully the nature of the documents and decide whether their predecisional nature has been established.

Document No. 1 is a copy of a letter a BPA official sent to a private firm regarding a new interconnection point to a BPA power line. Attached to the letter is a preliminary design diagram and a table listing the division of responsibilities for the project between the parties. BPA withheld the entire document pursuant to Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege. PSE argues that since this document was provided to a private individual outside of BPA, the deliberative process privilege was waived. We agree with PSE. FOIA exemptions may be waived if a document has been disclosed to others. See Carlson v. Department of Justice, 631 F.2d 1008, 1016 n.30 (D.C. Cir 1980). With regard to Document No. 1, it appears that the document was willingly disclosed to a private individual. Any deliberative process privilege that may have been applicable was waived by BPA's disclosure of the document. On remand, BPA should either promptly release Document No. 1 to PSE or issue another determination explaining under what exemption the document may be properly withheld. (8)

Documents Nos. 2 and 3 each consists of an e-mail message from a BPA official to other BPA officials with attached proposed schematic designs for a proposed project. The concerned parties have not yet agreed to the proposed project. Document No. 2 also contains a chart with preliminary cost figures for three separate design options for the project. With regard to the e-mail message within Document No. 2, portions of the message that are non-deliberative, such as the headings on top of the page, the last sentence, and the closing line, are not withholdable under the deliberative process privilege. The attached table in Document No. 2 contains information regarding costs for the three project options which are predecisional and deliberative and therefore withholdable pursuant to deliberative process privilege. However, most of the column headings to the attached table are segregable, non-deliberative information. The schematic diagrams are predecisional, deliberative material, which were properly protected in their entirety by Exemption 5. The e-mail message of Document No. 3 contains mostly predecisional, deliberative material. However, most of the e-mail headings, the last sentence, and the closing line, contain no deliberative material and, as such, are not protectable by the deliberative process privilege. The attached schematic diagram of a proposed option for the project is predecisional and deliberative and was properly protected in its entirety. On remand, BPA should release the non-deliberative portions of Documents Nos. 2 and 3 or issue another determination explaining under which FOIA exemption the material may be withheld.(9)

Document No. 4 consists of a BPA's employee's memorandum regarding Whatcom County PUD's proposed electrical service to another firm. Two sentences were withheld in the background section. The first sentence does not appear to be deliberative in nature but instead is a statement of fact. It therefore is not protectable pursuant to deliberative process privilege. The second sentence represents an opinion of the author as to who would be responsible with regard to a cost issue. This sentence is predecisional and deliberative and was therefore properly protected. Portions of text were also withheld in the section entitled "Current Situation." The portion withheld in the first sentence of this section does not appear to be deliberative. The withheld last two sentences of this section represent the opinions of the author and are predecisional and deliberative. They were therefore properly withheld pursuant to deliberative process privilege. The section title at the bottom of the first page is non-deliberative material and should not have been withheld pursuant to the deliberative process privilege. It is uncertain whether the withheld material at the bottom of the second page represents BPA's stated policy or the opinion of the author. On remand, BPA should issue another determination regarding the non-deliberative material in Document No. 4 and either release the material or explain why such material is withholdable under the FOIA. Additionally, BPA should make another determination regarding the material withheld at the bottom of the second page. If this material represents BPA adopted policy, it may not be protected by the deliberative process privilege.

Document No. 6 consists of a compilation of six e-mail messages. As discussed above, we believe that most of the two messages marked "Attorney-Client Confidential Information" were properly withheld pursuant to Exemption 5's attorney-client privilege. The remaining four e-mail messages consist of discussions and opinions by BPA officials regarding a proposed BPA project. BPA has informed us that no final decision has been reached with regard to the project. This material is therefore deliberative and predecisional and protected by Exemption 5. However, the e-mail headings are non-deliberative material. On remand, BPA should release the headings or explain the reason the material may be withheld pursuant to the FOIA.

Documents Nos. 11, 12, 13 and 16 are drafts of a Facilities Studies Agreement No. 98TX30171. These drafts represent BPA's proposed language for the agreement. However, the drafts are in the form of a letter to a private individual outside of BPA. BPA has informed us that it is uncertain whether any of these drafts were in fact disclosed to an outside individual. Consequently, we will direct on remand that BPA determine whether any of these drafts were disclosed outside of BPA. If so, BPA may have waived any deliberative process privilege that attached to the drafts. Document No. 12 contains a copy of the e-mail message that forwarded the draft. The e-mail message contains no deliberative material that could be protected by the deliberative process privilege.

Documents Nos. 14 and 15 contain a proposed timeline chart for completion of a Whatcom County PUD project and the proposed schematic design diagram for the project developed by BPA personnel. Both of these documents represent BPA proposals regarding the design and schedule for the proposed project. No agreement has been reached between BPA and Whatcom County PUD concerning this project. Thus both documents are predecisional, deliberative documents and were properly protected under Exemption 5. However, with regard to Document No. 14, some segregable non-deliberative information is not exempt. Specifically, the material consisting of all of the column headings of the chart, should either be released to PSE or BPA should issue another determination explaining under which FOIA exemption any of this material, such as the proposed location of the project, may be withheld.

BPA has informed us that Documents Nos. 17 and 18, while described differently to PSE in its determination letter, are actually the same document. This document is a letter from a BPA employee to a private firm. By disclosing it, BPA has waived any deliberative process privilege that may have attached to this document. Consequently, on remand BPA shall either release Documents Nos. 17-18 to PSE or issue another determination regarding this document.

Document No. 19 is an e-mail from a BPA employee regarding the proposed BPA project. BPA withheld the attachment to this e-mail, which consists of a list of the individual BPA team members for this project, their positions and their phone numbers, along with a description indicating the location of the proposed project. The withheld information, other than the proposed location of the project, is not deliberative or predecisional and is not witholdable pursuant to deliberative process privilege. BPA is concerned that release of these team members' names and phone numbers could subject these individuals to harassment. However, Exemption 5 only protects predecisonal, deliberative documents. The withheld list, other than the location of the proposed project, is purely factual and contains no deliberative elements. On remand, BPA should issue another determination regarding Document No. 19 and should either release the withheld information (other than the proposed location) or justify withholding the information pursuant to another FOIA exemption. (10)

Document Nos. 20 and 21 are e-mail communications from a BPA employee with attached notes. BPA has informed us that the attachments were prepared by an outside consultant firm. Because BPA's original determination does not describe how the deliberative process privilege applies to these non-government-created documents, we will order BPA, on remand, to issue another determination regarding these documents.

D. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that BPA properly applied Exemptions 4 and 5 to a significant portion of the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless demands disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. With regard to the material properly withheld in this matter pursuant to Exemption 5, the requested information consists of the opinions of individuals regarding different aspects of BPA decisions regarding the potential new business projects and the legal ramifications pertaining to these projects. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of employees and managers to make candid statements of opinion and seriously impede BPA's ability to obtain legal advice from its counsel. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the material protected pursuant to Exemption 5 contained in the requested documents would not be in the public interest.

In cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

E. Conclusion

While BPA correctly applied Exemptions 4 and 5 to a significant portion of the withheld material, we also find that some of the withheld material may not be withheld pursuant to the stated reasons given in BPA's Determination Letter. Further, BPA failed to segregate releasable material from exempt material. Consequently, we will remand this matter to BPA so that it may either release the information improperly withheld or issue another determination explaining why the material may be withheld pursuant to the FOIA. We will therefore grant PSE's appeal in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Puget Sound Energy, Inc. on February 12, 1999, Case No. VFA-0477, is hereby granted in part as set forth in Paragraph (2).

(2) This matter is remanded to the Bonneville Power Administration for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)BPA is a self-financing, federal power marketing administration created to market power generated by federal dams on the Columbia River system. BPA also owns and operates approximately 80 percent of the bulk electric transmission system (e.g., power lines) in the Pacific Northwest. BPA markets both electric power and electric transmission service to various customers in the Pacific Northwest.

(2)Whatcom County PUD #1 is an electric utility in the business of supplying customers with electric power.

(3)In its Appeal, PSE argues that it did not receive a timely response to its FOIA Request from BPA. We can find no authority in the DOE regulations that gives us jurisdiction to supervise or otherwise regulate the conduct of DOE agencies regarding time delays in processing FOIA requests. However, if a requester does not receive a response at the end of the 20-day period, the requester shall be deemed to have exhausted his administrative remedies and has a right to a review in a district court of the United States. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), (6)(A)(i), and (6)(C)(i); cf. Pollack v. Department of Justice, 49 F. 3d 115, 118-19 (4th Cir. 1995) cert. denied, 516 U.S. 843 (1995) (case decided under prior 10-day deadline).

(4)For the purposes of Exemption 4, the term "person" refers to a wide range of entities including partnerships, corporations, associations, and public or private organizations other than an agency. See Nadler v. FDIC, 92 F.3d 93, 95 (2d Cir. 1996). Thus, for Exemption 4 purposes, a utility such as Whatcom County PUD is considered to be a person.

(5)The Forecast estimates the amount of electricity Whatcom County PUD will provide to its customers in the next 10 years.

(6)The propriety of using Exemption 5 regarding the remaining four e-mail messages will be discussed infra in the next section of this Decision devoted to the BPA's application of the deliberative process privilege.

(7)We note that courts have held that an agency is not required to specifically point to an agency final decision to which a document has contributed. See Sears, 421 U.S. at 151 n.18.

(8)On Appeal, BPA has stated that it believes that a number of the withheld documents such as Documents Nos. 1, 17/18, 20 and 21 contain commercially sensitive information which would be protected by Exemption 5's qualified commercial privilege. See Federal Open Market Committee, 443 U.S. 340 (1979). Because BPA did not assert this privilege in its determination letter to PSE, we will not now issue an opinion regarding the applicability of that privilege to these documents. On remand, BPA may issue another determination asserting that privilege.

(9)BPA should review the headings in Documents Nos. 2 and 3 to determine if information describing the location and voltage of the proposed project is withholdable.

(10)We note that Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982). We express no opinion regarding the potential applicability of Exemption 6 to the documents at issue in this case.

Case No. VFA-0478, 27 DOE ¶ 80,196

March 23, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: International Brotherhood of Boilermakers

Date of Filing: February 16, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0478

On March 2, 1999, the law firm of Blake & Uhlig, on behalf of the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers (IBB), filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR) issued to IBB on January 28, 1999. The determination concerned a request for information that IBB submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would result in the release of any existing responsive material to IBB.

I. Background

On September 22, 1998, IBB filed a FOIA request with OR for: (1) a copy of the contract that Lockheed Martin Energy Systems, Inc., the management and operating contractor of Oak Ridge National Laboratory (ORNL), awarded to Thermal Engineering International (TEI) for work performed on the boilers at the X-10 Steam Plant at ORNL; (2) the request for proposal (RFP) that preceded the contract, and (3) information about the hourly wages of the individuals who worked on the boilers. Letter from IBB to OR (September 22, 1998) (Request Letter). OR released some responsive documents to IBB, but withheld unit prices and the total price of the contract. In a determination letter, OR indicated that the release of this material would impair TEI's competitive position and give TEI's competitors an unfair advantage over TEI in future procurements. Letter from OR to IBB (January 28, 1999). IBB then filed this Appeal, stating that OR provided very little relevant wage information pertaining to the employees who worked on the X-10 Steam Plant project.(1) Letter from Blake & Uhlig, P.A. to Director, OHA (February 10, 1999).

II. Analysis

The FOIA generally requires that agency records be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). However, the FOIA provides nine exemptions for specific types of information that the agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The exemption asserted in this case, Exemption 4, permits an agency to withhold from release "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). The contract material withheld in any case is clearly commercial information, and it was obtained from a person, defined to include a corporation such as TEI. See International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW), 27 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1998). Documents submitted on a non-voluntary basis, such as material submitted as part of a contract with the agency, are confidential for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained. National Parks & Conservation Association v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765, 770 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks).

In its determination letter, DOE/OR indicated that the disclosure of TEI's unit and total pricing information would "seriously impair TEI's competitive position, thus giving competitors a clear advantage over TEI for future procurements . . . ." Letter from OR to IBB (January 28, 1999). Thus, OR implies that the National Parks standard of confidentiality has been met. However, we have previously stated frequently and it is well accepted that an initial DOE determination that material should be withheld under Exemption 4 because its disclosure is likely to cause substantial harm to the submitter must include the reasons for believing that such harm will result to the competitive position of the person from whom the information is obtained. William E. Logan, Jr. & Associates, 27 DOE ¶ 80,185 (1999);Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell, 27 DOE ¶ 80,164 (1998); IBEW, 27 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1998); Larson Associated, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,204 (1996); Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993); Covington & Burling, 20 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,569 (1990) (Covington & Burling). An adequate explanation would, for example, indicate the type of competitive injury that would result from disclosure, or the manner in which the information, if disclosed, could be utilized by a competitor to damage the firm's market position. See Covington & Burling, 20 DOE at 80,569.

We reviewed the withheld material, and all other documents released to IBB. Our review disclosed that although OR withheld unit prices for two of the three items in the contract, they disclosed the unit price of Item No. 002, the installation of two economizers. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Linda Chapman, OR, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (March 16, 1999); Facsimile from Linda Chapman, OR, to Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA, at 10 (March 2, 1999). Thus, the only prices not disclosed were Item 001, the economizers (total of two), and Item 003, access doors (total of four).

We find that OR presented an inadequate justification for withholding the unit prices and the total contract price. This office has consistently held that the total price of a contract, after the contract has been awarded, usually does not reveal details of the submitter's bidding strategy and thus cannot normally be withheld under Exemption 4. See Baker, Donelson, Bearman & Caldwell, 27 DOE ¶ 80,164 (1998*) (*citing Covington & Burling, 20 DOE at 80,571*); Morgan, Lewis & Bockius*, 20 DOE ¶ 80,165 at 80,688 (1990) (stating that after contract is awarded, the proposal as a whole ceases to be unique and confidential). As for unit prices, this office generally has approved withholding such prices provided there is adequate demonstration of the potential for competitive harm in their disclosure. See FOIA Group, Inc., 27 DOE ¶ 80,111 (1998); Cascade Scientific, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,156 (1997). We note, however, that in this case, even though this contract contains only three items, OR has already disclosed the unit price of a very significant item. Under these circumstances, it is possible that disclosure of the contract's total price would allow TEI's competitors to calculate unit prices, causing substantial harm to TEI's competitive position. OR, however, has not demonstrated such harm. (2) Therefore, we will remand this matter to OR for the issuance of a new determination. In the new determination, OR shall either release the price information in the contract or present a specific explanation as to why each component of the pricing information the appellant seeks should be withheld under Exemption 4. (3) If OR is considering releasing the material, DOE regulations require it to solicit TEI's views on the matter. See IBEW, 27 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1998).

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on February 16, 1999 by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, OHA Case No. VFA-0478, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Oak Ridge Operations Office, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)OR supplemented its initial response; however, IBB did not receive the supplement until after it had filed this Appeal. In the supplement, OR informed IBB that some of the requested wage information had never been prepared and did not exist because it was not required by the Service Contract Act, 41 U.S.C. § 351, et seq. Letter from OR to IBB (February 10, 1999).

(2)We draw OR's attention to recent court decisions that deny Exemption 4 protection to unit prices when the submitter fails to demonstrate substantial harm "with sufficient specificity." See Martin Marietta Corp. v. Dalton, 974 F. Supp. 37, 40-41 (D.D.C. 1997); Comdisco, Inc. v. General Services Administration, 864 F. Supp. 510, 516 (E.D. Va. 1994)

(3)IBB also requested the hourly wages of all employees who worked on the contract. We have previously held that labor rates can properly be withheld under Exemption 4. See Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, 20 DOE at 80,688. Nonetheless, OR should also address this issue in its new determination.

Case No. VFA-0480, 27 DOE ¶ 80,195

March 23, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Matthew Cherney, M.D.

Date of Filing:February 23, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0480

On February 23, 1999, Matthew Cherney, M.D. (Appellant), filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on February 10, 1999, by the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE). That determination denied a request for information that the Appellant submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In this Decision and Order, we will consider whether the DOE must conduct a further search for documents responsive to the Appellant's FOIA request.

I. Background

On January 27, 1999, the Appellant filed a request under the FOIA with DOE's FOIA/Privacy Act Division in which he sought "a list of documents declared 'B5' in the OHA decision dated January 19th. A rough description of the documents in question along with the author(s), the date written and the date each one arrived in Washington will suffice." The documents in question pertain to an unsolicited proposal which the Appellant made to the DOE, and were the subject of an OHA FOIA Decision, Matthew Cherney, M.D., 27 DOE ¶ 80,181 (1999) (Cherney). On February 1, 1999, the FOIA/Privacy Act Division referred the request to OHA for a response. On February 10, 1999, OHA issued a determination to the Appellant. OHA stated it had searched its own office and also referred the FOIA request to the DOE's Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy (EE) and to DOE's Office of General Counsel (OGC). OHA found that the list the Appellant requested of documents withheld under Exemption b(5) of the FOIA, i.e., the Index of Documents Not Released (index), had already been provided to the Appellant and the Appellant had actually provided the same document to OHA. Therefore, since the Appellant already had it, OHA did not enclose a copy of the document with its February 10, 1999 determination. In addition, although OHA determined what date the underlying documents were sent to Washington, D.C., from the Oak Ridge Operations Office (OR), no information was discovered as to the date that they arrived in Washington, the precise item of information sought by the Appellant. Therefore, no documents were released to the Appellant in OHA's February 10, 1999 determination. See Letter from Thomas O. Mann, Deputy Director, OHA, to Appellant (February 10, 1999). On February 23, 1999, the Appellant filed the present Appeal of the February 10, 1999 determination, in which he contends that OHA's search for documents was inadequate.(1)

II. Analysis

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

Those OHA staff members who processed the Appellant's request informed us that the index at issue in Cherney was the only list of documents they were aware of that listed the documents withheld under Exemption b(5) and provided information as to the description, authors and dates of creation. In view of the Appellant's continued request for this document, we have decided to release the index again to the Appellant. We will forward that material to the Appellant under separate cover. We then reviewed how the search had been conducted with respect to documents relating to the date that each item in the index arrived in Washington from OR. We learned that OGC, which originally received the documents from OR, did not record or stamp the date received on any of the documents or the cover forwarding memorandum. See Record of Telephone Conversation between Paul Lewis, OGC, and Dawn Goldstein, OHA (March 4, 1999).(2) In reviewing this Appeal, we compared the withheld documents with the list that is the subject of this Appeal. We have determined that with two brief exceptions, the author, description, and date of creation of each document, if known, was supplied.(3) We are convinced that this is the only list of withheld documents which is responsive to the Appellant's request. Since no information exists regarding the other information requested (with the minor exceptions described in Footnote 3 above), we find that an adequate search was made for documents responsive to the Appellant's request. Given the above facts, we therefore find that this Office's search for responsive documents was adequate.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Matthew Cherney, M.D., on February 23, 1999, Case Number VFA-0480, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Date: March 23, 1999

(1)1/ This Appeal was processed by an OHA staff different from the one which processed the Appellant's FOIA request.

(2)2/ In our February 10, 1999 determination, we did inform the Appellant as to the date of the postmark demonstrating when the documents were mailed from Tennessee.

(3)3/ The two exceptions are first, that the author of item No. 1 of the index is Marc Simpson. See Fax from Robert Stivers, Oak Ridge Operations Office, to Dawn Goldstein (March 8, 1999). Second, we discovered items No. 2 and No. 4 of the index appear to be the same document.

Case No. VFA-0481, 27 DOE ¶ 80,194

March 22, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant:Los Alamos Study Group

Date of Filing:March 2, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0481

The Los Alamos Study Group (the "Study Group") files this Appeal pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552; 10 C.F.R. § 1004. The Study Group had requested information from the Department of Energy's Albuquerque Operations Office (the "Albuquerque Office"). In its most recent response, the Albuquerque Office sent the Study Group responsive documents from which substantial amounts of material had been redacted, and the Study Group appealed. As explained below, we will remand this matter to the Albuquerque Office.

In the background of this case is a report issued by the Albuquerque Office, titled "Site Wide Environmental Impact Statement (the "SWEIS"). In July 1997, the Study Group requested a copy of a document called "TA-55 SWEIS Key Parameter Data Report" (the "Data Report"). The Data Report was used to prepare the SWEIS. The Albuquerque Office informed the Study Group in October 1998 that it would not release the Data Report, claiming that it was protected from disclosure by Exemption 5 of the FOIA.

The Study Group appealed the October 1998 determination. We made three findings in our decision issued after consideration of the appeal. First, we required the Albuquerque Office to provide a "detailed explanation of the reason that release of the withheld information would expose the deliberative process." Second, we directed the Albuquerque Office to review the Data Report to decide whether its release would be in the public interest, and, if not, to provide the reasons for its decision. Third, we directed the Albuquerque Office to explain how release of any of the withheld material would result in foreseeable harm to the basic institutional interests that are protected by Exemption 5. Los Alamos Study Group, 27 DOE ¶ 80,177 (1999).

On remand, the Albuquerque Office released a redacted copy of the Data Report: a three-page index, a page of introductory text, and a graphic of the TA-55 facility. The remaining fifty-one pages of the released version of the Data Report were blank, except for headings that were included in the index. In its determination letter, the Albuquerque Office stated that the "withheld information is factual rather than deliberative in nature." It further explained that:

There is foreseeable harm to the Department in releasing the information. Disclosure of the report would reveal the Department's deliberative process in preparing the SWEIS because a comparison between the information contained in the draft report and the SWEIS would reveal what material supplied by contractors was deemed appropriate for inclusion in the SWEIS. It is precisely this disclosure of a deliberative process that Exemption 5 is meant to protect.

Finally, by revealing the larger body of facts from which specific facts were drawn would not significantly further the public interest in gaining insight as to how the Department operates. Any slight benefit that would accrue from the release of the withheld material is far outweighed by the chilling effect that such a release would have on the Department's willingness to collect a large amount of factual information to assist in the making of a discretionary decision.

The Study Group then filed the present appeal, contending that the Albuquerque Office's decision to withhold information is not adequately explained in its determination letter.

The FOIA generally requires that federal agencies covered by the act release documents to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). There are, however, nine exemptions in the FOIA for types of information that an agency may withhold. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)- (b)(9). At issue in this case is Exemption 5 of the FOIA, which allows an agency to withhold "inter- agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party … in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified several privileges that fall under this definition. These privileges include the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "pre-decisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege permits an agency to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, it must be both pre-decisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e., reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. A common application of the deliberative process privilege is to protect draft documents. The fact that a document is a draft, however, does not end the analysis; in addition, the agency must consider whether Exemption 5 can be applied in a manner consistent with the guidance contained in the Memorandum from the Attorney General dated October 4, 1993). The Attorney General's Memorandum applies a presumption in favor of disclosure unless an agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable, specific harm to a specific interest protected by an exemption. See U.S. Solar Roof, 25 DOE ¶ 80,112 at 80,530 (1995); William D. Lawrence, 24 DOE ¶ 80,139 at 80,599 (1994).

In analyzing the withholding of material under Exemption 5, we begin with "the simple test that factual material must be disclosed but advice and recommendations may be withheld." Wolfe v. Department of Health and Human Services, 839 F.2d 768, 774 (D.C. Cir. 1988). While this fact/opinion test offers "a quick, clear, and predictable rule of decision," it must not be applied mechanically. This is because Exemption 5 serves to protect the deliberative process itself, not merely documents containing deliberative material. Id. Therefore, when an agency withholds material under Exemption 5, it "must examine the information requested in light of the policies and goals that underlie the deliberative process privilege." Id.

A series of decisions by the District of Columbia Circuit illustrates how the deliberative process privilege can protect factual matter. In Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, 491 F.2d 63 (D.C. Cir. 1974), the requester sought summaries of an administrative record that aides had prepared for the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. The summaries had been compiled to help the administrator determine whether the pesticide DDT was harmful to the environment. The court upheld the agency's decision to withhold the summaries under Exemption 5. In its decision, the court reasoned that "when a summary of factual material on the public record is prepared by the staff of an agency administrator, for his use in making a complex decision, such a summary is part of the deliberative process, and is exempt from disclosure under Exemption 5 of the FOIA." Montrose Chemical, 491 F.2d. at 71.

Similarly, in Russell v. Department of the Air Force, 682 F. 2d 1045 (D.C. Cir. 1982), and Dudman v. Department of the Air Force, 815 F. 2d 1565 (D.C. Cir. 1987), the court shielded draft versions of official Air Force histories. The histories covered operations conducted during the Vietnam War. In protecting the drafts from disclosure, the court found that they were produced to inform future policy decisions. Russell, 682 F.2d at 1046, 1047; Dudman Communications, 815 F.2d at 1566.

On the other hand, in Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 677 F.2d 931 (D.C. Cir. 1982), the court held that the FOIA required the disclosure of a report. The report had been compiled by staff members of the Department of Justice at the request of the Attorney General to inform the Senate Judiciary Committee concerning activities of a certain FBI informant

In Mapother v. Department of Justice, 3 F.3d 1533 (D.C. Cir. 1993), the court shielded from disclosure a report on Kurt Waldheim's activities during World War II. The Justice Department had compiled the report for the Attorney General in deciding whether Waldheim was eligible to enter the United States. In holding that the Waldheim Report was properly withheld under Exemption 5, the D.C. Circuit explained its reasoning in the cases cited above.

It is true that the products of such labors can loosely be characterized as factual, in the sense that the issues ultimately being addressed have a prominent factual component: What is the evidence indicating that DDT is dangerous? What actions did the Air Force undertake, and what results did it achieve in a certain set of operations? Was substantial evidence adduced on a particular point at trial? In cases such as this, however, the selection of the facts thought to be relevant clearly involves "the formulation or exercise of … policy-oriented judgment" or "the process by which*policy* is formulated," Petroleum Info. Corp., 976 F.2d at 1435 (emphasis in the original), in the sense that it requires "exercises of discretion and judgment calls," id. at 1435….

As our later cases make plain, the key to Montrose Chemical was not the relationship between the requested summaries and the public record, but that between the summaries and the decision announced by the EPA Administrator. See Playboy Enterprises, 677 F.2d at 936 (distinguishing Montrose Chemicals on grounds that it involved "a complex decision in an adjudicatory proceeding" as opposed to an investigative report "prepared only to inform"); Petroleum Info. Corp., 976 F.2d at 1437 (a "salient characteristic" of information eligible for protection under deliberative process privilege is its "association with a significant policy decision") (emphasis in the original). Like the information requested in Montrose Chemical, the majority of the … factual material [requested in Mapother] was assembled through an exercise of judgment in extracting pertinent material from a vast number of documents for the benefit of an official called upon to take discretionary action. Therefore, we conclude that the Department properly withheld the product of this process.

Mapother, 3 F.3d at 1539. In summary, when a draft document is requested, the nature of the final document must be examined carefully to determine the applicability of Exemption 5. If the SWEIS were prepared "only to inform," then materials used to prepare it, such as the Data Report, would be analogous to the report in Playboy Enterprises. It would not therefore be shielded by Exemption 5. If, however, the SWEIS is part of a process by which policy is formulated, then the Data Report is analogous to the material protected in Montrose Chemical, Russell, Dudman Communications, and Mapother. In other words, disclosure of the Data Report would reveal the deliberative process, and it could be shielded under Exemption 5.

Nothing in the determination letter from the Albuquerque Office addresses whether the SWEIS is an informational or policy document. We are therefore unable to determine from the record available to us whether Exemption 5 is applicable to the Data Report. Consequently, we will remand this matter to the Albuquerque Office for further proceedings consistent with this Decision.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the Los Alamos Study Group, Case No. VFA-0481, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Freedom of Information Act Official of the Albuquerque Operations Office of the Department of Energy for further action in accordance with the directions set forth in this Decision.

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: BP Exploration, Inc.

Date of Filing: March 10, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0482

This Decision and Order concerns an Appeal that BP Exploration, Inc. (BP) filed from a determination issued to it by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office (SPRP). In this determination, SPRP granted in part a request for information that BP filed pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. In its appeal, BP contests the adequacy of SPRP's determination, and requests the release of certain withheld information.

I. Background

In its FOIA request, BP asked for a copy of the lease between the DOE and Exxon Co., USA (Exxon) for the Bryan Mound Distribution System in Texas. SPRP released this document to BP in redacted form, withholding under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4) (Exemption 4) the formula used to determine the amounts to be paid by Exxon to the DOE. Exemption 4 protects from mandatory disclosure trade secrets and privileged or confidential commercial or financial information that is obtained from a person. SPRP explained its application of Exemption 4 in the following manner:

Exxon claims that this information is confidential and privileged, and that its release would cause substantial competitive harm to Exxon. Disclosure of this underlying cost data would place Exxon at a commercial disadvantage with potential customers and competitors.

SPRP Determination Letter at 1. In its Appeal, BP contests the adequacy of this determination, and contends that SPRP improperly applied Exemption 4 in withholding the price information.

II. Analysis

Once the DOE decides to withhold information, both the FOIA and the Department's regulations require the agency to provide a reasonably specific justification for its withholding. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6), 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Kleppe, 547 F.2d 673 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (Kleppe); Digital City Communications, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,657 (1997); Data Technology Industries, 4 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1979). This allows both the requester and this Office to determine whether the claimed exemption was accurately applied. Tri-State Drilling, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,202 at 80,816 (1997). It also aids the requester in formulating a meaningful appeal and this Office in reviewing that appeal. Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, 22 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,517 (1992).

Thus, an agency withholding material under Exemption 4 must explain how that exemption was applied. William E. Logan, Jr. & Associates, 27 DOE ¶ 80,185 (1999) (Logan). If, for example, the agency believes that disclosure is likely to cause substantial competitive harm, it must state its reasons for this finding. Larson Associated, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,204 (1996); Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993). Conclusory and generalized allegations of substantial competitive harm are unacceptable and cannot support an agency's decision to withhold requested documents. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. F.D.A., 704 F.2d 1280, 1291 (D.C.Cir. 1983); Kleppe.

The circumstances in Logan are quite similar to those in the case that is presently before us. In Logan, the requester sought access to lease and purchase agreements between the DOE and an oil company concerning a crude oil pipeline and terminal. The agency released redacted copies of the agreements, withholding information relating to costs under Exemption 4. On appeal, we found the agency's determination to be deficient because it did not adequately explain the manner in which that Exemption was applied. We stated that in Exemption 4 cases, the agency must first determine whether the information in question is a trade secret or is commercial or financial information. If the former, then the agency's analysis is complete and the material may be withheld under Exemption 4. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. Food and Drug Administration, 704 F.2d 1280, 1286, 1288 (D.C. Cir. 1983). However, we said that if the agency determines the material is commercial or financial information, obtained from a person, and privileged or confidential, then there is an additional analysis that must be performed. First, the agency must decide whether the information was involuntarily or voluntarily submitted. If the information was voluntarily submitted, it may be withheld under Exemption 4 if the submitter would not customarily make such information available to the public. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992). If it was involuntarily submitted, the information may be withheld under Exemption 4 if disclosure would either impair the government’s ability to obtain similar information in the future or cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. National Parks and Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765, 770 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

The determination letter issued by SPRP to BP does not adequately justify the agency's application of Exemption 4 in withholding the price-related information. Because the determination letter mentions substantial competitive harm, it appears that SPRP categorized the price data as involuntarily submitted commercial or financial information. However, SPRP did not provide any explanation of how it arrived at this categorization. As a result, we cannot evaluate whether SPRP applied the proper standard in withholding the price information. Furthermore, the determination letter does not specify the competitive harm that disclosure of the information would cause, nor does it provide any basis for its apparent finding that such harm would be "substantial." Consequently, the determination letter consists of the type of conclusory or general allegations of competitive harm that the courts have found to be inadequate, and it does not permit either a meaningful appeal or an appropriate review.

We will therefore remand this matter to SPRP. On remand, SPRP should either release the withheld information or provide a new justification for withholding it. If SPRP continues to withhold the information under Exemption 4, it must fully explain its analysis, including the nature of the competitive harm that disclosure would cause and SPRP's reasons for believing that such harm would be "substantial."

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by BP Exploration, Inc., Case No. VFA-0482, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office, to issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:The National Security Archive

Date of Filing:March 11, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0483

The National Security Archive filed an Appeal from a determination issued to it on February 24, 1999, by the Deputy Director, Communications and Information, Headquarters Air Combat Command of the Department of the Air Force (Deputy Director). In that determination, the Deputy Director denied in part a request for information that the National Security Archive filed with the Air Force on February 25, 1994, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. Some of the information deleted from the document the Air Force released in that determination was withheld pursuant to a review of the documents by the Office of Declassification of the Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to instruct the Deputy Director that the DOE no longer requires the classification and withholding of information that the Air Force withheld on the DOE's behalf.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On February 25, 1994, the National Security Archive submitted a request under the FOIA to the Department of the Air Force for a copy of Strategic Air Command Study 109, "Operation Recovery, 17 January-7 April 1966." The Air Force sent portions of the document to the DOE for classification review. The DOE completed that review and responded to the Air Force in March of 1996. In October of 1998 the Air Force asked the DOE to perform a second classification review, because it believed that changes in the DOE's classification policies in the intervening period might lead to a different result. The DOE completed its second review and advised the Air Force on November 20, 1998, that the document contained classified information that it considered exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). On February 24, 1999, the Air Force released to the National Security Archive a copy of the requested report from which it withheld information that the DOE claimed was exempt from disclosure under the FOIA, as well as additional information that the Air Force withheld on its own behalf under another exemption of the FOIA.

In its Appeal to the DOE, the National Security Archive seeks the disclosure of the information on pages

285-290 of the report, which the Air Force withheld at the request of the DOE. The National Security Archive contends that the information the DOE has identified as classified on those pages should be declassified and released, because they concern an overseas nuclear weapons accident that occurred decades ago, and any general information on that topic would not assist nuclear proliferants.

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, meets the above criteria, and therefore information withheld under that Act must also be withheld under the FOIA. See, e.g., Hans M. Kristensen, 27 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1999); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990).

Upon referral of the Appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Office of Security Affairs again reviewed those portions of pages 285-290 for which the DOE had claimed exemptions from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA. That Office has now concluded that those pages no longer contain any information that needs to remain classified by the DOE. The information, though no longer classified by the DOE, may still be classified by the Air Force. The DOE will advise the Air Force of its determination and the Air Force will then inform the National Security Archive of its own determination concerning that information. Accordingly, the National Security Archive's Appeal will be granted.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by the National Security Archive on March 11, 1999, Case No. VFA-0483, is hereby granted.

(2) The Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs shall inform the Deputy Director, Communications and Information, Headquarters Air Combat Command of the Department of the Air Force, that pages 285-290 of Strategic Air Command Study 109, "Operation Recovery, 17 January-7 April 1966" contain no DOE classified information.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:William E. Logan, Jr.

Date of Filing:March 12, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0484

On March 12, 1999, William E. Logan, Jr. filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him in response to a request for documents submitted under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Assistant Project Manager for Management and Administration (Authorizing Official) of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office (SPR) issued the determination on February 12, 1999. This Appeal, if granted, would require that the Authorizing Official release responsive information withheld under FOIA Exemption 4, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4).

The FOIA requires that a federal agency generally release documents to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that a federal agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that the DOE shall nonetheless release to the public a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On November 18, 1998, William E. Logan, Jr. filed a request with the SPR for information concerning lease agreements between Shell Pipe Line Corporation (now doing business as Equilon Pipeline Company LLC) and the DOE for the Bayou Choctaw crude oil pipeline and St. James Terminal. The Authorizing Official responded to this FOIA request in a December 3, 1998 letter and provided documents responsive to Mr. Logan's request, but redacted Equilon's payment equations (also known as formula rates) pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA. Following the Authorizing Official's determination, Mr. Logan filed an appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals of the DOE (OHA). On January 21, 1999, the OHA issued a decision in which it remanded the appeal to the SPR for a new determination to either release the payment equations or provide a new justification for withholding. William E. Logan, Jr., 27 DOE ¶ 80,185 (1999). Finally, on February 12, 1999, the SPR issued a new determination in which it continued to withhold the payment equations pursuant to Exemption 4 of the FOIA.

II. Analysis

In his Appeal, Mr. Logan claims that the SPR incorrectly applied Exemption 4 to the responsive information. Mr. Logan states that the formula rates are not fee schedules used for the sale of any of Equilon Pipeline Company's services, but are formulas for rental payment amounts paid to the federal government for use of the pipeline. Furthermore, he states that there are several reasons the formula rates are not proprietary. First, the federal government obtained these rates from Equilon through a negotiation. Second, the contract between Equilon and the federal government did not contain a trade secret, proprietary information or confidentiality clause. Finally, he states, since the federal government "is one of the contracting parties and is receiving revenue from this contract," that unless the federal government "claims that the information is classified . . . ," the SPR must disclose the information. For these reasons, Mr. Logan argues that the OHA must reverse the SPR's determination and disclose the withheld information.

As an initial matter, we note that Mr. Logan's arguments do not directly address the requirements for an agency to withhold a document pursuant to Exemption 4. Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to qualify under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (1) trade secrets or (2) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). In National Parks, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that commercial or financial information submitted to the federal government involuntarily is "confidential" for purposes of Exemption 4 if disclosure of the information is likely either (1) to impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (2) to cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the government obtained the information. Id. at 770; Critical Mass Energy Project v. NRC, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (Critical Mass). By contrast, information a submitter provided to an agency voluntarily is "confidential" if "it is of a kind that the provider would not customarily make available to the public." Critical Mass, 975 F.2d at 879.

In appropriate cases, Exemption 4 protects the release of the type of information the requester seeks. We have reviewed the redacted information and find that it contains payment equations negotiated between the SPR and Shell Pipeline Corporation for rental of the pipeline. These negotiated payment equations are confidential commercial information within the meaning of Exemption 4. The SPR obtained this material from a "person" as Exemption 4 requires, since the FOIA considers corporate entities as persons for the purposes of that exemption. See John T. O'Rourke & Associates, 12 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1985). In this case, once the SPR began negotiations with Shell Pipeline Corporation, the SPR required the firm to submit a proposed rental amount for use of the pipeline. See April 5, 1999 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, and Deanna Harvey, SPR Program Analyst, and Pat Sigur, SPR Realty Officer. Since the submission of this rental amount was necessary to complete the lease agreement, we find that the firm's submission was involuntary. Thus, the information Shell Pipeline Corporation submitted is "confidential" if it meets the test set out in National Parks. We conclude that the payment equations are confidential because their release would substantially harm the submitter's competitive position. A competitor could use the release of these payment rates to easily determine how to adjust its proposed rental payments to offer more favorable terms than the submitter in an attempt to obtain another similar agreement with the federal government. In fact, the contract between the SPR and Equilon allows for the possibility of a pipeline rental recompetition. See April 5, 1999 Record of Telephone Conversation between Leonard M. Tao, OHA Staff Attorney, and Deanna Harvey, SPR Program Analyst, and Pat Sigur, SPR Realty Officer. Moreover, release of these lease terms would provide a competitor with detailed information revealing the submitter's financial strategy and methods in its negotiations with the federal government.

III. The Public Interest in Disclosure

The DOE regulations provide the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. We have determined that Exemption 4 requires the continued withholding of negotiated payment equations between the SPR and Equilon. However, in cases involving material determined to be exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 4, we do not make the usual inquiry into whether release of the material would be in the public interest. Disclosure of confidential information that an agency can withhold pursuant to Exemption 4 would constitute a violation of the Trade Secrets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1905, and is therefore prohibited. See, e.g., Chicago Power Group, 23 DOE ¶ 80,125 at 80,560 (1993). Accordingly, we may not consider whether the public interest warrants discretionary release of the information properly withheld under Exemption 4.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal William E. Logan, Jr. filed on March 12, 1999, Case No. VFA-0484, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Kristine Anne Horpedahl

Date of Filing: March 22, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0485

On March 22, 1999, Kristine Anne Horpedahl (Horpedahl) filed an Appeal with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that DOE's Office of the Inspector General (OIG) issued to Horpedahl on March 9, 1999. The determination concerned a request for information that Horpedahl submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Appeal, if granted, would result in the release of any existing responsive material to Horpedahl.

I. Background

On January 27, 1999, Horpedahl filed a FOIA request with the OIG for "a copy of the OIG Administrative Report to Management, MRD File, IG-98-INV-08, Case No. I96AL021 and any other OIG documentation naming [Horpedahl]." Letter from Horpedahl to OIG (January 27, 1999) (Request Letter). On March 9, 1999, the OIG advised Horpedahl that the case file that she requested was still open, and that she should resubmit her request after the case closed. Letter from OIG to Horpedahl (March 9, 1999) (Determination Letter). The OIG went on to state that it had reviewed the case file documents, and "[a]t this time, those documents are being withheld in their entirety pursuant to . . . Exemption 7(A)." Id. According to the OIG, "[r]elease of the withheld material at this time could prematurely reveal evidence and interfere with the ongoing enforcement proceeding." Id. In addition, pursuant to DOE regulations, the OIG further determined that it was not in the public interest to release the investigative information. Id. Horpedahl then filed this Appeal. Letter from Horpedahl to Director, OHA (March 22, 1999).

II. Analysis

The FOIA generally requires that agency records be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). However, the FOIA provides nine exemptions for specific types of information that the agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9).

The exemption asserted in this case, Exemption 7(A), permits an agency to withhold at its discretion "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information (A) could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(I). DOE regulations further provide that a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public, whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

A. Exemption 7(A)

In order to qualify for exemption from disclosure under FOIA Exemption 7(A), an investigatory record must meet two criteria: (1) it must be compiled for law enforcement purposes, and (2) its release could reasonably be expected to interfere with an ongoing enforcement proceeding. See Solar Sources, Inc. v. U. S., 142 F.3d 1033, 1037 (7th Cir. 1998) (Solar Sources); North v. Walsh, 881 F.2d 1088, 1097 (D.C. Cir. 1989); Bevis v. Department Of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1388 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Bevis).

The threshold requirement in any Exemption 7 inquiry is whether the documents are compiled for law enforcement purposes, i.e., as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. See Scripps Institute of Oceanography, 27 DOE ¶ 80,160 (1998) (Scripps); William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996); F.B.I. v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). We have consistently found that the OIG compiles information for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7. SeeScripps, 27 DOE at 80,648; Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1997); Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1997). The OIG informed us that it accumulated the requested information as part of an ongoing enforcement proceeding. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Jackie Becker, OIG, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA (March 30, 1999). Therefore, we find that the responsive documents were compiled for law enforcement purposes.

In order to withhold documents compiled for law enforcement purposes, the agency must show that disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally interfere with enforcement proceedings. Solar Sources, 142 F.3d at 1037; Murray, Jacobs & Abel, 25 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1995) (Murray); NLRB v. Robbins Tire and Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 224 (1978) (NLRB). It is well-established that the agency may justify its withholdings by reference to generic categories of documents, rather than on a document-by-document basis. See, e.g., Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389; Murray, 25 DOE at 80,575; North v. Walsh, 881 F.2d 1088, 1097 n.10 (D.C. Cir. 1989). The courts have allowed agencies to take a generic approach and to "group documents into relevant categories that are sufficiently distinct to allow a court to grasp how each . . . category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation." See Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389, quoting Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, 789 F.2d 64, 67 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Crooker).

In Bevis, the court described a three-step process that an agency must use to make a generic determination pursuant to Exemption 7(A). We restated that process in Murray:

First, the government must define its categories functionally. Second, it must conduct a document by document review in order to assign documents to the proper category. Finally, it must explain how the release of each category would interfere with enforcement proceedings.

Murray, 25 DOE at 80,575-576. According to the court, in order for a category to be acceptable in a functional sense, it must allow the court to trace a rational link between the nature of the document and the alleged likely interference. Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389, quoting Crooker, 789 F.2d at 64, 67. Thus, in order to use the generic approach, the OIG must establish a connection between the categories of documents that Horpedahl requested and alleged interference with the investigation if those documents were disclosed.

B. The Determination Letter

As an initial matter, we note that the Determination Letter did not name any categories of documents. Thus, we have no indication that the OIG has defined any categories in this case. We note that the Determination Letter referred only to the "case file documents." There was no mention of the second part of Horpedahl's request (i.e., other OIG documents that referred to her by name).

As previously stated, an agency must justify its withholdings under Exemption 7(A) either by document or by categories of documents. However, the determination letter made no reference to a document-by-document analysis or to a category analysis. Nonetheless, even though the OIG did not define any relevant categories in this case, we are permitted to infer two categories for purposes of a Bevis analysis. We have previously classified each item in an appellant's request as a separate category. For instance, in Murray, the appellant listed six items in its request, and OHA interpreted each numbered item as a category. See Murray, 25 DOE at 80,573-574. In the instant case, Horpedahl requested two items: (1) the investigative case file, and (2) all other OIG documents mentioning her name. Thus, for the purpose of this analysis, we shall treat each item as a category.

1. The Investigative Case File

We find that the OIG properly withheld the investigative case file from the requester.(1) The case file contains information relating to an ongoing enforcement proceeding. That information, if disclosed, could logically be expected to "impede an appropriate resolution of the investigation" by prematurely revealing evidence, prematurely disclosing enforcement efforts, or providing individuals involved in the investigation an opportunity to fabricate or destroy evidence or intimidate witnesses. Determination Letter at 1-2. Thus, we find that there is a rational link between the investigative material in the file and the alleged interference with the proceeding that is likely to occur if the contents are released.

2. Any Other OIG Documents Naming the Requester

We find that the Determination Letter is insufficient as regards this category of documents. This office has previously stated that "an authorizing official must clearly specify the categories of documents upon which he is making his determinations of interference." Murray, 25 DOE at 80,577. The OIG did not indicate whether it is in possession of any responsive material that is not contained in the investigative file. In fact, the OIG did not address this category at all. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to the OIG for release of any existing, non-exempt responsive material, or for issuance of a written justification for further withholding.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on March 22, 1999 by Kristine Anne Horpedahl, OHA Case No. VFA-0492, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) This case is hereby remanded to the Office of the Inspector General, which shall promptly issue a new determination in accordance with the guidance set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0486, 27 DOE ¶ 80,207

May 20, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Hans M. Kristensen

Date of Filing:March 23, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0486

Hans M. Kristensen filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him on January 25, 1999, by the Chief, Information Control Branch, of the Communications and Information Directorate of the Department of the Air Force (Branch Chief). In that determination, the Branch Chief denied in part a request for information that Mr. Kristensen filed with the Air Force on November 30, 1995, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. Some of the information deleted from the document the Air Force released to Mr. Kristensen in that determination was withheld pursuant to a review of the documents by the Office of Declassification of the Department of Energy's Office of Security Affairs. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to instruct the Branch Chief that the DOE no longer requires the classification and withholding of the information that the Air Force withheld on the DOE's behalf.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On November 30, 1995, Mr. Kristensen submitted a request under the FOIA to the Department of the Air Force for a number of documents, including one entitled "History of Strategic Air Command, Historical Study No. 73, 1 January 1958- 30 June 1958." On May 28, 1996, the Air Force sent the documents to the DOE for classification review. In response to that request, the DOE advised the Air Force on June 17, 1998, that the document contained classified information that it considered exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3 of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3). The Air Force did not release the results of its own classification review at that time. On January 25, 1999, the Air Force released to Mr. Kristensen excerpts from this document, from which it withheld information that the DOE claimed was exempt from disclosure under the FOIA.

In his Appeal to the DOE, Mr. Kristensen seeks the disclosure of those portions of the excerpts that the Air Force withheld at the request of the DOE. Mr. Kristensen contends that the information the DOE has identified as classified should be declassified and released, because the records are over 40 years old and because continued withholding of this information is contrary to the FOIA's spirit of "maximum responsible disclosure."

II. Analysis

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., Hans M. Kristensen, 27 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1999); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990). The portions that the DOE deleted under Exemption 3 were withheld on the grounds that they contain nuclear weapons data and information about military allocation, planning, and deployment that was classified as Formerly Restricted Data under the Atomic Energy Act and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure.

Upon referral of the Appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Office of Security Affairs again reviewed those portions of the excerpts for which the DOE had claimed exemptions from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA. That Office has now concluded that the document no longer contains any information that needs to remain classified by the DOE. The information, though no longer classified by the DOE, may still be classified by the Air Force. The DOE has advised the Air Force of its determination and the Air Force will now inform Mr. Kristensen of its own determination concerning that information. Accordingly, Mr. Kristensen's Appeal will be granted.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Hans M. Kristensen on March 23, 1999, Case No. VFA-0486, is hereby granted.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0487, 27 DOE ¶ 80,201

April 22, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Puget Sound Energy, Inc.

Date of Filing: March 25, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0487

On March 25, 1999, Puget Sound Energy, Inc. (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on January 5, 1999 by the Department of Energy's Bonneville Power Administration (BPA).(1) This Appeal, if granted, would require BPA to release the withheld information and to conduct an additional search for responsive documents.

I. BACKGROUND

On December 30, 1998, the Appellant submitted a FOIA request to the BPA. On February 24, 1999, BPA issued a determination letter releasing 29 documents responsive to the Appellant's request. However, BPA withheld, under Exemption 5 of the FOIA, 9 documents that were responsive to the Appellant's request. On March 24, 1999, the appellant submitted the present Appeal, challenging the extent of the search that BPA conducted for responsive documents and BPA's application of Exemption 5 to the 9 withheld documents.(2)

II. ANALYSIS

A. Adequacy of the Search

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993);Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993). To determine whether an agency's search was adequate, we must examine its actions under a "standard of reasonableness." McGehee v. CIA, 697 F.2d 1095, 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1983), modified in part on rehearing, 711 F.2d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1983). This standard "does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

The Appellant contends that BPA's search was inadequate. Specifically, it asserts that: (1) BPA's search produced a smaller number of documents than the Appellant expected to receive; (2) the "documents tended to have been generated within very short time-frames in different years;" and (3) most of the material appears to come from only a small group of people. Appeal at 2, 7.

None of these arguments consists of anything but speculation. "Mere speculation that as yet uncovered documents may exist does not undermine the finding that the agency conducted a reasonable search for them." Safecard Services, Inc. v. Department of Justice, 926 F.2d 1197, 1201 (D.C. Cir. 1991). The adequacy of a search cannot be judged on the basis of whether it produced the number of documents that expected by the requester. The search in the present case identified 38 responsive documents, which, on its face, does not appear to be an inordinately small number of documents.

We reviewed the search conducted by BPA and found it to be adequate. The search was conducted by Tim Johnson, Esq., a BPA attorney with extensive knowledge of the subject matter area. Mr. Johnson informed us that he sent a memorandum to all BPA employees involved in evaluating the issues that were the subject of the request, instructing them to inform him of any documents that might be responsive to the request. As a result, 38 responsive documents were identified. Accordingly, we reject the Apellant's claim that BPA's search for responsive documents was inadequate.

B. Exemption 5

The FOIA requires that federal agencies generally release documents to the public upon request. Following an appropriate request, the FOIA requires agencies to search their records for responsive documents. Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter- agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that Exemption 5 incorporates those “privileges which the Government enjoys under the relevant statutory and case law in the pre-trial discovery context.” Renegotiation Board v. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp., 421 U.S. 168, 184 (1975); see also NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears). Among the privileges that fall under this exclusion is the executive or deliberative process privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980). The deliberative process privilege permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The purpose of the privilege is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for the deliberative process to shield a document, it must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

BPA has withheld nine documents under the deliberative process privilege. The Appellant challenges these withholdings claiming that BPA must relate each withheld document to a particular decision in order to claim that it was predecisional. Appeal at 7-8. This contention is without merit. In order to determine whether a document is predecisonal, an agency does not have to specifically identify a particular agency decision, but rather must merely indicate "what deliberative process is involved, and the role played by the documents in issue in the course of that process." Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 868. As the Supreme Court has held:

Our emphasis on the need to protect pre-decisional documents does not mean that the existence of the privilege turns on the ability of an agency to identify a specific decision in connection with which a memorandum is prepared. Agencies are, and properly should be, engaged in a continuing process of examining their policies; this process will generate memoranda containing recommendations which do not ripen into agency decisions; and the lower courts should be wary of interfering with this process.

Sears, 421 U.S. at 151 n. 18.

After reviewing the nine withheld documents, we are convinced that BPA properly applied Exemption 5 to them. Each of the documents reflects internal communications consisting solely of candid and frank discussions of policy, political, practical, legal and economic implications of a potential large- scale business transaction. The frank and candid discussions include the weighing of various strategic and tactical aspects of the policies being considered. They are thus clearly pre-decisional and deliberative in nature and are clearly the type of information that Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege was designed to protect.

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that BPA properly applied Exemption 5, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless demands disclosure pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. With regard to the material properly withheld in this matter pursuant to Exemption 5, the requested information consists of the opinions of individuals regarding different aspects of BPA decisions about potential new business projects and the legal and political ramifications pertaining to these projects. The release of this information would in our opinion have a chilling effect on the willingness of employees and managers to make candid statements of opinion and seriously impede BPA employees' ability to engage in candid discussions about important decisions. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the requested documents would not be in the public interest.

III. Conclusion

Since the Appellant has not shown that the search for responsive documents conducted by BPA was inadequate and since we have concluded that BPA properly withheld nine documents under Exemption 5, we find that the present Appeal shall be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Puget Sound Energy, Inc. on March 25, 1999, Case No. VFA-0487, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)BPA is a self-financing federal agency created to market power generated by federal dams on the Columbia River system. BPA also owns and operates approximately 80 percent of the bulk electric transmission system (e.g., power lines) in the Pacific Northwest. BPA markets both electric power and electric transmission service to various customers in the Pacific Northwest.

(2)In its Appeal, the Appellant also argues that it did not receive a timely response to its FOIA Request from BPA. The DOE regulations do not give us jurisdiction to oversee time delays in processing FOIA requests. However, if a requester does not receive a response within the 20-day deadline provided by statute, the requester is deemed to have exhausted his administrative remedies and has a right to a review in a district court of the United States. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), (6)(A)(i), (6)(C)(i); *cf. Case No. VFA-0488, 27 DOE ¶ 80,212

June 24, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Matthew Cherney, M.D.

Date of Filing: April 13, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0488

On April 13, 1999, Matthew Cherney, M.D., filed an Appeal from determinations issued by the Office of Power Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy (DOE/EE). The determinations responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A). However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(B). Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

Dr. Cherney requested from the DOE all documents in its possession related to an unsolicited proposal he had submitted to the DOE. The proposal concerned a system for collecting solar energy invented by Dr. Cherney. Dr. Cherney's request specified the following categories of documents relating to the proposal:

(1) All documents received by DOE and given consideration;

(2) All written comments from all evaluators (and any calculations): Dr. Allan Hoffman, Dr. Joseph Galdo, Jeff Muhs, Slo Rajic, Marc Simpson, and Anthony Schaffhauser;

(3) All comments from any other evaluators;

(4) Transcripts of any oral comments made by any evaluator;

(5) Any other documents in the file; and

(6) Any electronic communications or telephone recordings.

On July 24, 1998, DOE/EE issued a partial response to the Appellant's request in which it released copies of 26 responsive documents. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Dr. Matthew Cherney, Sunbear

Systems (July 24, 1998). DOE/EE issued another partial response on September 18, 1998. In that determination, DOE/EE released an additional 35 documents in their entirety, released 4 other documents with information redacted from them, and identified 31 documents that it withheld in their entirety. DOE/EE stated that the information it was withholding was exempt from disclosure under Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Utility Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems (September 18, 1998). DOE/EE issued a third partial response on January 5, 1999, releasing an additional 21 documents. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Associate Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Power Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems (January 5, 1999). On March 8, 1999, DOE/EE issued a final response to the Appellant's request in which it released 10 responsive documents with information redacted under FOIA Exemptions 5 and 6. Letter from Allan R. Hoffman, Associate Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Power Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, to Matthew Cherney, M.D., Sunbear Systems (March 8, 1999).(1)

We discern three arguments in Dr. Cherney's Appeal. First, he states that he has “never received a bona fide list of the documents denied with appropriate descriptions, dates, authors, etc. . . . Nowhere were the documents described adequately.” Appeal at 1. Second, the Appellant disputes the adequacy of the DOE's search for documents responsive to his request. Id. at 2. Third, Dr. Cherney asks us to reconsider a finding we made in a decision on a prior Appeal. Id. at 1; Electronic mail from Matthew Cherney, M.D., to Steven Goering, OHA (May 14, 1999). The decision on Dr. Cherney's prior Appeal (Case No. VFA-0459) upheld in part DOE/EE's withholding of information under FOIA Exemption 5 in its first two partial responses. Matthew Cherney, M.D., 27 DOE ¶ 80,181 (1999).

Dr. Cherney styles his present submission a Motion for Reconsideration of our earlier decision, which we issued after DOE/EE had issued two partial responses to his request. However, Dr. Cherney's first two arguments, regarding the adequacy of DOE/EE’s determination and the adequacy of its search, logically apply to DOE/EE’s response as a whole, i.e. all four responses taken together. Thus, with respect to these two issues, we consider Dr. Cherney’s submission as a new Appeal of DOE/EE’s entire response to his request. We will also address below the Appellant’s request that we reconsider the finding in Case No. VFA-0459 to which he refers.

II. Analysis

A. Adequacy of DOE/EE's Description of Responsive Documents

As noted above, Dr. Cherney argues that he has “never received a bona fide list of the documents denied with appropriate descriptions, dates, authors, etc. . . . Nowhere were the documents described adequately.” Appeal at 1. In several recent cases, we have addressed the extent to which information withheld from a requester must be described in response to a FOIA request. We have held that “agency determinations to deny release of documents need only provide a general description of the withheld material, and a statement of the reason for withholding each document.” Tammi D. Mourfield Selvidge, 27 DOE ¶ 80,170 at 80,675 (1998); Missouri River Energy Services, 27 DOE ¶ 80,165 at 80,658 n.1 (1998); William Payne, 27 DOE ¶ 80,162 at 80,652 (1998). In the present case, DOE/EE specifically identified in each of its four responses to the Appellant the documents it located in its search that were responsive to the request. Where documents were identified but not released, DOE/EE specified under which FOIA Exemption it was withholding the information, and the basis for invoking the exemption. Thus, DOE/EE's responses permitted the appellant to formulate the basis for his appeal, and permitted the appellate authority to understand the DOE’s assertion of exemption. Therefore, we reject Dr. Cherney's request for a more detailed description of documents.

B. Adequacy of DOE/EE's Search for Responsive Documents

We have stated on numerous occasions that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents, and we have not hesitated to remand a case where it is evident that the search conducted was in fact inadequate. See, e.g., Butler, Vines and Babb, P.L.L.C., 25 DOE ¶ 80,152 (1995). The FOIA, however, requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "[T]he standard of reasonableness which we apply to agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of the files; instead, it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985); accord Weisberg v. Department of Justice, 745 F.2d 1476, 1485 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In cases such as these, "[t]he issue is not whether any further documents might conceivably exist but rather whether the government's search for responsive documents was adequate." Perry v. Block, 684 F.2d 121, 128 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

After receiving Dr. Cherney's Appeal, we contacted DOE/EE to obtain additional information regarding its search for documents responsive to the appellant's request. The individual responsible for conducting the search of DOE Headquarters for responsive documents was Joseph Galdo, a DOE/EE employee. Dr. Galdo informed us that he identified two locations where he believed responsive documents would be located, specifically, his file concerning Dr. Cherney's proposal and a file maintained by another DOE/EE employee. Because he had a copy in his file of the contents of the file maintained by the other DOE/EE employee, he believed that his file contained the universe of documents at DOE Headquarters responsive to the appellant's request.

Also considered by DOE/EE to be responsive to Dr. Cherney's request were documents under the jurisdiction of the DOE's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR). We contacted the DOE/OR and we were informed that DOE/OR conducted a search of its procurement and contracts division, and also forwarded the request to the Oak Ridge National Laboratories (ORNL). ORNL is operated under contract with the DOE by Lockheed Martin Energy Systems and Lockheed Martin Energy Research. Because Dr. Cherney's proposal was the subject of litigation involving Lockheed Martin, the documents at ORNL related to his proposal had already been gathered by the Lockheed Martin counsel's office. Documents considered responsive to the appellant's request were forwarded by both DOE/OR and ORNL to DOE Headquarters for processing as part of DOE/EE's response to request.

Dr. Galdo further informed us that the DOE/EE's Office of Power Technologies maintains a chronological file of correspondence, which includes correspondence between that office and Members of Congress. He indicated that while that file may contain correspondence from Members of Congress on behalf of Dr. Cherney, Dr. Galdo did not consider documents in that file to be responsive to Dr. Cherney's request.

While we understand Dr. Galdo's interpretation of the request, we believe that any correspondence between DOE Headquarters and Members of Congress that reference Dr. Cherney's proposal would be responsive to Dr. Cherney's request for "all documents related to" his proposal. Although Dr. Cherney listed specific categories of documents that he stated his request included, our reading of the request is that this listing was intended to be illustrative, not exhaustive. Therefore, we will remand this matter to DOE/EE so that it may issue a new determination to the appellant. Before issuing its new determination, DOE/EE should reconsider the scope of its search in light of the interpretation of Dr. Cherney's request we adopt here, that is, all documents in the possession of DOE that relate in any way to Dr. Cherney's proposal.(2)

C. Request for Reconsideration of Finding Made in Case No. VFA-0459

As noted above, in our decision on Dr. Cherney's Appeal in Case No. VFA-0459, we found that DOE/EE properly withheld some material from the Appellant under FOIA Exemption 5. Exemption 5 of the FOIA shields from public disclosure, among other things, records reflecting the predecisional, consultative process of an agency. Benedetto Enterprises, Inc., 19 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1989); Darci L. Rock, 13 DOE ¶ 80,102 (1985). Thus in our decision, we considered which documents responsive to Dr. Cherney's request were predecisional. On this issue Dr. Cherney argued that, although he received a letter from DOE dated March 23, 1998, stating that the DOE would not fund his proposal, the actual decision on his proposal was made prior to that date. We reviewed the documents withheld from the appellant and the letters sent to him on March 23, 1998, and we concluded that none of the documents evidenced an agency decision on Dr. Cherney's proposal prior to March 23, 1998. Dr. Cherney would like us to now reconsider that conclusion.

A request for reconsideration is treated as an application for modification or rescission under the OHA's general procedural regulations, 10 C.F.R. Part 1003. Under these regulations, we will process an application for modification or rescission only if "the applicant demonstrates that it is based on significantly changed circumstances; . . ." 10 C.F.R. § 1003.55(b)(1). "For purposes of this subpart, the term 'significantly changed circumstances' shall mean--

(i) the discovery of material facts that were not known or could not have been known at the time of the proceeding and action upon which the application is based;

(ii) the discovery of a law, rule, regulation, order or decision on appeal or exception that was in effect at the time of the proceeding upon which the application is based and which, if such had been made known to the OHA, would have been relevant to the proceeding and would have substantially altered the outcome; or

(iii) there has been a substantial change in the facts or circumstances upon which an outstanding and continuing order of the OHA affecting the applicant was issued, which change has occurred during the interval between issuance of such order and the date of the application and was caused by forces or circumstances beyond the control of the applicant.

Applying the above definition, the only "changed circumstances" we can find described by Dr. Cherney relate to the first category, i.e. "the discovery of material facts that were not known or could not have been known at the time of the proceeding and action upon which the application is based[.]" Specifically, Dr. Cherney refers to documents of which he has recently become aware, either by receiving the documents from the DOE or because our office has referred to them in a response to a separate FOIA request. These documents allegedly support Dr. Cherney's contention that the DOE's decision on his proposal was made prior to March 23, 1998.

With respect to the documents that Dr. Cherney's states he received from the DOE, we asked the appellant to provide copies of those documents, but he did not. Nonetheless, we requested from DOE/EE copies of documents that fit the description given by Dr. Cherney. We have reviewed these documents, and again find that none of them evidences an agency decision on Dr. Cherney's proposal prior to March 23, 1998.

In his Appeal, Dr. Cherney also refers to the OHA's response to his January 22, 1999 FOIA request. In that FOIA request, Dr. Cherney sought a list of the documents we found to be properly withheld under FOIA Exemption 5 in our decision on his Appeal in Case No. VFA-0459, and also requested information as to when those documents "arrived in Washington." In a February 10, 1999 response to this request, the OHA stated that it did not locate documents indicating when the documents in question arrived in Washington. Based on this response, Dr. Cherney now argues that "if you cannot say for sure when something arrived in [W]ashington, it is not" protected by FOIA Exemption 5. There is no doubt that, in order to be shielded by Exemption 5, a document must be both predecisional, i.e. generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give and take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. This is why our conclusions in VFA-0459 regarding the predecisional nature of the requested documents rested in part on when the documents were generated, not when they "arrived in Washington." Because Dr. Cherney's argument does not address when documents were generated, but only when they arrived in Washington, which is irrelevant for these purposes, it provides no basis for reconsidering our finding in Case No. VFA-0459.

D. Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we are remanding this matter to DOE/EE for the limited purpose of conducting a new search for documents in response to the appellant's request. In conducting this search, DOE/EE should consider responsive to the request not only those categories of documents specifically described by the appellant in his request, but also all documents in the possession of DOE that relate in any way to Dr. Cherney's proposal. We note that on remand DOE/EE is only required to conduct “a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials,” not the “absolute exhaustion” of DOE's files. Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85. DOE/EE should then issue a new determination identifying to the appellant any documents in the possession of the DOE that are responsive to this broader interpretation of the request, but were not so identified in DOE/EE's previous determinations, and either releasing those documents or explaining why they may be withheld pursuant to a FOIA exemption. With respect to all other issues Dr. Cherney has raised, we will deny his Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Matthew Cherney, M.D., Case No. VFA-0488, is granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of Power Technologies, Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy, for further proceedings in accordance with the instructions set forth in this Decision and Order.

Director

Office of Hearings and Appeals

Date: June 24, 1999

(1)DOE/EE did not identify any documents responsive to items 3 and 4 of the Appellant's request in any of its responses.

(2)In his Appeal, Dr. Cherney alleges a “high level of participation” by DOE's Office of General Counsel (DOE/GC) in the DOE's decision regarding his proposal. While we are aware of no evidence supporting Dr. Cherney's allegation, DOE/EE should consider as responsive to Dr. Cherney's request any document in the possession of DOE/GC related to his proposal, since Dr. Cherney's request was made to DOE generally and not DOE/EE specifically.

Case No. VFA-0489

September 26, 2001

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Greenpeace

Date of Filing: April 5, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0489

Hans M. Kristensen filed an Appeal, on behalf of Greenpeace, from a determination that Albuquerque Operations Office (Albuquerque) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to Greenpeace on March 31, 1999. In that determination, Albuquerque denied in part a request for information that Greenpeace submitted on January 19, 1994, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. It provided copies of two documents from which information was withheld. That information was withheld as the result of the DOE's Office of Declassification, as well as the Department of Defense (DOD) and the Department of State (DOS), reviewing the documents and determining that they contained classified information. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the information that it withheld from those two documents. A third document was requested but not located at DOE; that document is not a part of this Appeal.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

On January 19, 1994, Greenpeace requested information under the FOIA concerning three specific topics. Albuquerque responded to the requests by stating that it was unable to locate any documents relating to the first topic, "U.S. Navy INF Potential, 1988," and providing one document responsive to each of the other topics. Information was deleted from each of those documents pursuant to a DOE determination that some of the withheld information warranted protection from disclosure under Exemptions 1 and 3 of the FOIA and determinations by the DOD and the DOS that the remainder of the withheld information was classified and therefore warranted protection from disclosure under the FOIA. These two documents were identified as "Modular Weapons Systems and Insertable Nuclear Components" (Document 1) and "An Overview of Tactical-Nuclear-Weapon Employment in Central Europe, Korea, and the Middle East" (Document 2).

The present Appeal seeks the disclosure of the withheld portions of the two documents described above. In his Appeal, Mr. Kristensen contends that the withholdings are "based on outdated guidance, unreasonable, and out of sync with recent FOIA reform."

II. Analysis

Exemption 1 of the FOIA provides that an agency may exempt from disclosure matters that are "(A) specifically authorized under criteria established by an Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy and (B) are in fact properly classified pursuant to such Executive order." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1). Executive Order 12958 is the current Executive Order that provides for the classification, declassification and safeguarding of national security information. When properly classified under this Executive Order, national security information is exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 1. See National Security Archive, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Keith E. Loomis, 25 DOE ¶ 80,183 (1996); A. Victorian, 25 DOE ¶ 80,166 (1996).

Exemption 3 of the FOIA provides for withholding material "specifically exempted from disclosure by statute . . . provided that such statute (A) requires that the matters be withheld from the public in such a manner as to leave no discretion on the issue, or (B) establishes particular criteria for withholding or refers to particular types of matter to be withheld." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(3); see 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(3). We have previously determined that the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2011-2296, is a statute to which Exemption 3 is applicable. See, e.g., National Security Archive, 26 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1996); Barton J. Bernstein, 22 DOE ¶ 80,165 (1992); William R. Bolling, II, 20 DOE ¶ 80,134 (1990).

The Director of Security Affairs has been designated as the official who shall make the final determination for the DOE regarding FOIA appeals involving the release of classified information. DOE Delegation Order No. 0204-139, Section 1.l (December 20, 1991). Upon referral of this appeal from the Office of Hearings and Appeals, the Director of Security Affairs (now the Director of Security and Emergency Operations) (Director) reviewed those portions of the requested documents for which the DOE had claimed exemptions from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA.

According to the Director, the DOE determined on review that both documents contain information concerning nuclear weapon plans and employment, as well as other details of military utilization of nuclear weapons. These types of information have been classified as Formerly Restricted Data (FRD) under the DOE's current classification guidance. Document 1 also contains information regarding nuclear weapons design, which has been classified as Restricted Data (RD) under the DOE's current classification guidance. Under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, RD and FRD are forms of classified information, and are therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 3. The Director has also informed us that some of the material withheld from each of the documents relates to military plans, targeting priorities, and intelligence information. As such, it is defined as National Security Information under Section 1.5(a) and (c) of Executive Order 12958, and is therefore exempt from mandatory disclosure under Exemption 1 of the FOIA. The material that the DOE continues to withhold under Exemptions 1 and 3 of the FOIA is identified in the margin of the documents as "DOE (b)(1)" and "DOE (b)(3)."

In performing his review the Director requested that the DOD and the DOS also review the validity of the deletions each of those agencies originally made from the two documents. Each agency has completed its review. The Director has marked all deletions made at the direction of the DOD, under Exemptions 1 and 3 of the FOIA, as "DOD" in the margin of the documents. The denying official for these withholdings is Mr. H.J. McIntyre, Director, Freedom of Information and Security Review, Department of Defense. In addition, the DOS has instructed the Director to withhold one passage in Document 2 under Exemption 1 of the FOIA, which has been marked "DOS (b)(1)" in the margin. The denying official for this withholding is Margaret P. Grafeld, Director, Office of Information Resource Management Programs and Services, Department of State.

Based on the Director's review, we have determined that Executive Order 12958 and the Atomic Energy Act require the continued withholding of significant portions of the documents under consideration in this Appeal. Although a finding of exemption from mandatory disclosure generally requires our subsequent consideration of the public interest in releasing the information, nevertheless such consideration is not permitted where, as in the application of Exemptions 1 and 3, the disclosure is prohibited by executive order or statute. Therefore, those portions of the documents that the Director has now determined to be properly classified must be withheld from disclosure. Nevertheless, the DOD and the Director have reduced the extent of the previously deleted portions to permit releasing the maximum amount of information consistent with national security considerations. Because some previously deleted information may now be released, newly redacted versions of the two documents reviewed in this Appeal will be provided to Greenpeace under separate cover. Accordingly, Greenpeace's Appeal will be granted in part and denied in part.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Greenpeace on March 31, 1999, Case No. VFA-0489, is hereby granted to the extent set forth in paragraph (2) below and denied in all other respects.

(2) Newly redacted versions of the documents entitled "Modular Weapons Systems and Insertable Nuclear Components" and "An Overview of Tactical-Nuclear- Weapon Employment in Central Europe, Korea, and the Middle East," in which additional information is released, will be provided to Greenpeace.

(3) This is a final order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0490, 27 DOE ¶ 80,203

May 5, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Roy Chavez

Date of Filing: April 6, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0490

On April 6, 1999, Roy Chavez filed an Appeal from a determination issued to him by the Director of the FOIA /Privacy Act Division of the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of the Executive Secretariat (hereinafter referred to as "the Director"). This determination was issued in response to a request for information that was processed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C § 552, and the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Parts 1004 and 1008, respectively.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA that set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(7); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9).

The Privacy Act was enacted to prevent the unnecessary dissemination of personal information compiled about individuals by federal agencies. The Act also requires each agency to permit a requester to gain access to information pertaining to him which is contained in any system of records maintained by the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). However, under the Privacy Act, agencies may provide that some systems of records are not subject to the Act's disclosure provisions, but only to the extent that those records fall under certain specified exemptions. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(j), (k).

I. Background

This proceeding was initiated by Mr. Chavez's request under the Privacy Act for a copy of his security clearance file. To afford him greater access to his records, the request was processed under both the Privacy Act and the FOIA. The DOE's Office of Safeguards and Security located this file in the DOE-43 "Personnel Security Clearance Files" system of records. The DOE has provided that this system of records is excepted from the disclosure provisions of the Privacy Act to the extent that the records contain information that is subject to the Act's exemptions. 10 C.F.R. § 1008.12(b)(3)(ii). In his determination, the Director released to Mr. Chavez copies of all of the documents in his file except one. This one document, a memorandum of a telephone conversation between two DOE employees, was withheld in its entirety under Exemption k(5) of the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a(k)(5), and Exemption 7(D) of the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D). Exemption k(5) of the Privacy Act permits the withholding of "investigatory material compiled solely for the purpose of determining suitability, eligibility or qualifications for Federal civilian employment, . . . or access to classified information, but only to the extent that the disclosure of such material would reveal the identity of a source who furnished information to the Government under an express promise that the identity of the source would be held in confidence . . . " 5 U.S.C. § 552a(k)(5). Exemption 7(D) of the FOIA provides that "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes" may be withheld, "but only to the extent that the production of such" documents "could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source . . . which furnished information on a confidential basis . . . and, in the case of a record or information compiled by . . . an agency conducting a lawful national security intelligence investigation, information furnished by a confidential source." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D). The Director concluded that release of the withheld document would disclose both the identity of a source who requested and was promised confidentiality, and the information that that source provided in confidence.

II. Analysis

In his Appeal, Mr. Chavez contests the Director's application of Exemption k(5) of the Privacy Act. (1) Specifically, he contends that release of the memorandum would not reveal the identity of a confidential source because he is already aware of the source's identity, that the confidentiality agreement has been waived by the source's wide dissemination of information concerning the source's contact with the other DOE employee described in the memorandum, and that the continued withholding of the memorandum deprives him of his Privacy Act right to correct erroneous information in his file and of his constitutional right to due process under the Fifth Amendment. For the reasons set forth below, we reject Mr. Chavez's claims, and find that the Director properly withheld the memorandum under Exemption k(5).

In previous cases, we have stated that a requester's alleged knowledge of the identity of a source is irrelevant to a determination of the applicability of Exemption k(5). Dale R. Callaghan, 20 DOE ¶ 80,150 (1990); Jeffrey L. Turek, 11 DOE ¶ 80,142 (1983). See also Volz v. Department of Justice, 619 F.2d 49 (10th Cir. 1980) (Volz). In Volz, the court said

It is clear that the primary purposes of the exemption [k(5)] are to protect the privacy of confidential informants and facilitate governmental access to investigatory material which would not be made available absent a promise of confidentiality . . . These purposes would not be realized if disclosure could be compelled merely because the one seeking disclosure is aware that the source has given information of some sort to the agency. Not only the fact that an individual has talked to the agency but also the information thus obtained is protected from disclosure.

Id. at 50 (citations omitted). Mr. Chavez has not convinced us that the holdings in these cases are incorrect. We therefore conclude that his alleged knowledge of the identity of the source is irrelevant to the issue of whether the Director properly applied Exemption k(5).

Mr. Chavez's next contention is that confidentiality was waived when the person whom he believes to be the source wrote about communications with the other DOE employee mentioned in the withheld memorandum, and widely disseminated those writings. We find this argument to be equally unavailing. In Nemetz v. Department of the Treasury, 446 F. Supp 102 (N.D. Ill. 1978), the court held that a source did not waive confidentiality under Exemption k(5) when he discussed the content of the withheld information with the requester's attorney, stating that "[i]f an individual is to waive the express protections of [k(5)], it must be unequivocal. [The source] may have revealed a large portion of the contents of his interview to the [requester's] attorney, but he expressly refused to give a written authorization for release." Id. at 106. See also Lesar v. Department of Justice, 636 F.2d 472, 491 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (no waiver of confidentiality under analogous Exemption 7(D) of the FOIA where confidential information has become public). In the case before us, the source asked for and was promised confidentiality before providing information to the DOE. Moreover, the Director had contacted the source, who reiterated a desire for confidentiality. Determination Letter at 2. Under these circumstances, we cannot find a waiver of confidentiality.

Finally, Mr. Chavez argues that the withholding of the memorandum denies him his right under the Privacy Act to correct erroneous information in his personnel security file, and his constitutional right to be apprised of the charges against him. Although the Privacy Act does grant individuals access to government files containing information about them, that access is circumscribed by other provisions of the Act. As we previously stated, the Act permits agencies to protect certain systems of records from disclosure to the extent that those records contain information that falls under one of the Act's exemptions. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(j), (k). The withheld document is contained in the system of records denominated as DOE-43, "Personnel Security Clearance Files," which has been excepted from the access provisions of the Act pursuant to Exemption k(5). 10 C.F.R. § 1008.12(b)(3)(ii). Therefore, the withheld memorandum is not subject to disclosure or amendment under the Act. Any other result would effectively eviscerate Exemption k(5). The requester "can have access to the records, except parts identifying [the source] . . . unless they are otherwise exempted . . . There is some impediment by operation of the exemptions but that must be accepted unless the exceptions are to be destroyed." Hernandez v. Alexander, 671 F.2d 402, 408 (10th Cir. 1982).

We find Mr. Chavez's constitutional argument to be equally without merit. The record does not indicate that any disciplinary proceeding against Mr. Chavez has been initiated. Therefore, no formal charges, of which Mr. Chavez would have to be apprised, have been brought. Should such charges be brought, the extent to which he will be advised of material in his security clearance file is an issue that will have to be considered carefully. The Director's determination withholding the memorandum at this time does not deprive Mr. Chavez of life, liberty or property without due process of law pursuant to the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution. For the reasons set forth above, we will deny Mr. Chavez's Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Privacy Act Appeal filed by Roy Chavez on April 6, 1999 is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552a(g). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are located, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0491, 27 DOE ¶ 80,204

May 5, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Wilma Louise Ingram

Date of Filing: April 9, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0491

On April 9, 1999, Wilma Louise Ingram filed an Appeal from an April 1, 1999 determination of the Director of the Office of External Affairs of the Department of Energy's (DOE) Richland Operations Office (Director). The Director issued that determination in response to Ms. Ingram's request for information filed under the Privacy Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552a, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1008. The Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE's Richland Operations Office to release the requested information.

Background

Ms. Ingram filed a request under the Privacy Act in which she sought copies of medical and school records pertaining to her. In her determination, the Director informed Ms. Ingram that the DOE does not have any school records pertaining to her. Furthermore, the Director stated that her office conducted a search using Ms. Ingram's name and social security number, but found no medical records pertaining to her. Ms. Ingram contends that she was subjected to radiation releases from Hanford while she attended elementary school in the Spokane, Washington area. She believes that the DOE must have records pertaining to her exposure to these radiation releases. For this reason, Ms. Ingram requests that the DOE conduct a further search for responsive information.

Analysis

The Privacy Act requires, inter alia, that each federal agency permit an individual to gain access to information pertaining to him contained in any system of records the agency maintained. 5 U.S.C. § 552a(d). DOE regulations define a system of records as "a group of any records under DOE control from which information can be retrieved by using the name of the individual or by some identifying number, symbol, or other identifying particulars assigned to the individual." 10 C.F.R. § 1008.2(m).

We have investigated the Director's search made in response to Ms. Ingram's request and find it fully complies with the requirements of the Privacy Act. In response to Ms. Ingram's request, the Director conducted a thorough search of the relevant system of records using Ms. Ingram's name and her social security number, but found no information responsive to Ms. Ingram's request. The Director's representative further indicated that the system of records searched, DOE-33 "Personnel Medical Records," is the only system of records likely to contain information pertaining to medical records. See Record of April 20, 1999 Telephone Conversation between Leonard Tao, OHA Attorney, and Angela Lowman, Richland Operations Office. Based on the foregoing, we conclude that the Director has adequately searched all the systems of records under Richland's control that might reasonably be expected to contain the material sought by Ms. Ingram.

Furthermore, since Ms. Ingram remembers being tested for radiation exposure while attending elementary school, we asked the Director's representative to search Richland's records using the names of the elementary schools Ms. Ingram attended. The Director's representative searched records entitled "Dietary Studies for Local School Children" and confirmed that the DOE had some records for schools in the Tri-Cities area near Hanford, but no records for the schools Ms. Ingram attended in the Spokane area. Id. Accordingly, we must deny the present Appeal.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Privacy Act Appeal Wilma L. Ingram filed on April 9, 1999, OHA Case No. VFA- 0491, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552a(g)(1). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

May 7, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Wray & Kracht

Date of Filing: April 9, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0492

Wray & Kracht (Wray) filed this Appeal on April 9, 1999 with the Office of Hearings and Appeals (OHA) of the Department of Energy (DOE) in response to a determination that the DOE's Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office (SPRO) issued to Wray on March 10, 1999. The determination concerned a request for information that Wray submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. If the present Appeal were granted, SPRO would be required to release any responsive material.

I. Background

Wray is a law firm that represents a subcontractor of SPRO's management and operating contractor, DynMcDermott Petroleum Operations Company (DM). On December 18, 1998, Wray requested copies of several categories of documents, including (1) DOE Performance Evaluation Committee Reports (PECs) from September 1996 to September 1998; and (2) a copy of DM's Responses to the PECs (Responses).(1) On March 10, 1999, SPRO provided some responsive material to Wray, but withheld the PECs and Responses in their entirety. Letter from SPRO to Wray (March 10, 1999) (Determination Letter). In its determination, SPRO withheld the PECs and Responses under Exemption 5, and justified its action by explaining that "[t]he subject documents are recommendatory in nature and consist of opinions which are part of the process by which governmental decisions and policies are formulated." Determination Letter at 2.

Wray appeals this determination on several grounds. First, Wray argues that SPRO has waived the deliberative process privilege by incorporating the withheld material into the Award Fee Letter, which SPRO released to Wray in response to the FOIA request. Letter from Wray to Director, OHA (April 9, 1999) (Appeal) at 3. Second, Wray argues that SPRO did not comply with DOE regulations, which require a statement explaining why discretionary release was not appropriate, and also require SPRO to address the issue of releasing any segregable, nonexempt factual material. Appeal at 1. Finally, Wray contends that the documents at issue contain only "objective, factual reports" of DM's performance and thus are not associated with the deliberative process. Appeal at 3.

II. Analysis

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency memoranda or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation

with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (NLRB). The "deliberative process" privilege falls under this definition of exclusion, and this is the privilege that SPRO relied upon in its determination. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

The deliberative process privilege shields from public disclosure records reflecting the predecisional, consultative process of an agency. See Matthew Cherney, M.D., 27 DOE ¶ 80,187 (1999); Los Alamos Study Group, 27 DOE ¶ 80,177 (1999) (LASG); Edwin S. Rothschild, 27 DOE ¶ 80,150 (1998) (Rothschild). Predecisional materials are not exempt merely because they are prepared prior to a final action, policy, or interpretation. These materials must be a part of the agency's deliberative process by which decisions are made. Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136, 1144 (D.C. Cir. 1975). This privilege was developed primarily to promote frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making government decisions. EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (Mink) (quoting*Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp., v. United States*, 157 F. Supp. 939 (Cl. Ct. 1958)). The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions. NLRB, 421 U.S. at 151 (1975).

Wray contends that SPRO waived the deliberative process privilege by incorporating material from the PECs and Responses into the Award Fee Letter. Wray states that "information which may otherwise be privileged is discoverable if the Government incorporates it either expressly or by reference into the agency's preliminary or final decision. This is consistent with . . . the principle articulated by the Supreme Court in Mink that statements of policy and deliberations that become final policy are not privileged . . . ." Appeal at 3. We do not agree. We reviewed Mink and found no support for Wray's interpretation of that case asserted here. Rather, Mink supports our conclusion that the privilege continues to apply to pre-decisional material used in the deliberative process even after the agency has determined and disclosed to the public its final policy. See Mink, 410 U.S. at 87 (advisory opinions merit privilege in order to promote frank discussions of policy matters in writing). See also Vaughn, 523 F.2d at 1144 (predecisional material is privileged under Exemption 5 so long as it is part of the agency's deliberative process); Rothschild, 27 DOE at 80,614 (1998) (deliberative, pre-decisional material does not lose its privilege under the FOIA when that material is subsequently used as the basis for final agency policy). Therefore, we find that SPRO did not waive the deliberative process privilege when it released the Award Fee Letter to Wray.

Wray also argues that the determination letter did not address the issues of discretionary disclosure and the release of segregable, nonexempt factual material. DOE regulations provide that "[t]o the extent permitted by other laws, the DOE will make records available which it is authorized to withhold under 5 U.S.C. § 522 whenever it determines that such disclosure is in the public interest." 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Thus, under DOE regulations, SPRO is obligated to consider release of the withheld documents if such release is in the public interest. (2) In addition, the FOIA requires the agency to provide to the requester any reasonably segregable portion of a record after deletion of the portions that are exempt. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). S*ee also FAS Engineering Inc.*, 27 DOE ¶ 80,131 (1998), quoting Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (factual material must be disclosed unless inextricably intertwined with exempt material). Since the determination letter did not consider the issue of discretionary disclosure or identify segregable, nonexempt factual material, we find SPRO's determination to be insufficient in this regard.

Finally, Wray submits that the withheld documents contain only factual material. After a careful review of the documents, this office finds that the responsive information contains both factual and non-factual material. Much of the information is purely opinion and reflects the observations of various individuals on DM's performance during a six-month period. Nonetheless, the documents also contain some reasonably segregable factual information (e.g., dates of subcontract awards, project completion dates, report dates) that may not be withheld under Exemption 5 unless inextricably intertwined with exempt material.

III. Conclusion

Our review of the documents at issue reveals that they contain reasonably segregable factual material that is subject to release. However, these documents were withheld in their entirety. In addition, the Determination Letter did not address the issues of whether release of the withheld material would be in the public interest. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to SPRO. On remand, SPRO must review the withheld documents and segregate and release all purely factual portions of the documents, or issue a new determination that justifies further withholding. In addition, in the new determination, SPRO must address discretionary disclosure and the issue of the public interest in the withheld material.(3)

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed on April 9, 1999 by Wray & Kracht, OHA Case No. VFA-0492, is hereby granted as set forth in paragraph (2) below, and is in all other respects denied.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve Project Management Office, for further proceedings in accordance with the instructions set forth in this Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)SPRO evaluates DM's performance as management and operating contractor every six months using PECs, recommendations from the Award Fee Board, and DM's self- assessment. See, e.g., Letter from Deputy Assistant Secretary, SPRO, to Project Manager, DM (May 15, 1998) (Award Fee Letter). Using these documents, SPRO determines DM's award fee for that evaluation period in accordance with the provisions of the contract. Id.

(2)We note that Wray has not provided any arguments which would support a conclusion that it would further the public interest if the withheld material were disclosed.

(3)We note that it is DOE policy with respect to Exemption 5 to withhold only information that if released would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that it protects. Thus, SPRO may withhold information under Exemption 5 only if its disclosure would result in foreseeable harm to the interests that are protected by the deliberative process privilege. See LASG, 27 DOE at 80,692-693.

Case No. VFA-0493, 27 DOE ¶ 80,209

May 28, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Matthew Cherney, M.D.

Date of Filing: April 19, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0493

Matthew Cherney, M.D., (Dr. Cherney) filed this Appeal in response to a determination that the Department of Energy's Office of the Inspector General (OIG) issued to him on April 5, 1999. The determination dealt with a request for information that Dr. Cherney submitted pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department at 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In his Appeal, Dr. Cherney requests the release of responsive material. As explained below, we will remand Dr. Cherney's request to the OIG for a new determination.

I. Background

On March 9, 1999, Dr. Cherney filed a request under the FOIA for copies of documents relating to an inquiry conducted by the OIG. On April 5, the OIG advised Dr. Cherney that the documents would be withheld because the inquiry was still open. The OIG explained that:

A review of the responsive documents ... has been made.... The responsive documents are being withheld in their entirety pursuant to ... Exemption 7(A).... There has not been a final determination concerning this matter. Accordingly, Exemption 7(A) has been applied to the responsive documents. Release of the material at this time could prematurely reveal evidence and interfere with the ongoing enforcement proceeding.

II. Analysis

The basic policy of the FOIA is to promote disclosure of agency records. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). However, the FOIA provides nine exemptions for specific types of information that the agency may withhold at its discretion. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)-(b)(9). The exemption asserted by OIG in this case, Exemption 7(A), permits an agency to withhold at its discretion “records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that the production of such law enforcement records or information ... could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings.” 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(A); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(i).

In order to qualify for exemption from disclosure under Exemption 7(A), an investigatory record must meet two criteria: (1) it must be compiled for law enforcement purposes, and (2) its release could reasonably be expected to interfere with an enforcement proceeding. Solar Sources, Inc. v. U. S., 142 F.3d 1033, 1037 (7th Cir. 1998) (Solar Sources); North v. Walsh, 881 F.2d 1088, 1097 (D.C. Cir. 1989); Bevis

v. Department Of State, 801 F.2d 1386, 1388 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Bevis). We will consider the two criteria separately.

1. Whether the Documents Were Compiled for Law Enforcement Purposes

The threshold requirement in any Exemption 7 inquiry is whether the documents are compiled for "law enforcement purposes." Scripps Institute of Oceanography, 27 DOE ¶ 80,160 (1998) (Scripps); William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996); F.B.I. v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). Dr. Cherney argues strenuously that the OIG is not a law enforcement agency, and that its files are therefore not compiled for law enforcement purposes. He contends that "OIG is not a law enforcement operation. They do audits, write reports and the like.... [OIG has] no capacity to act as law enforcement does. They cannot indict someone. They cannot arrest someone."

Dr. Cherney's arguments are beside the point. The determination as to whether a particular activity is for "law enforcement purposes" in terms of Exemption 7 does not turn on the agency's ability to issue indictments or make arrests. Instead, courts have reasoned that "law enforcement purposes" include not only investigations based on civil and criminal law, but statutes involving administrative and regulatory proceedings as well. Center for National Policy Review v. Weinberger, 502 F.2d 370 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (Center for National Policy Review). Consequently, courts have extended Exemption 7 protection to many activities other than traditional police work. We cite the following examples of successful assertions of Exemption 7: Center for National Policy Review (investigation by the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare); Kay v. F.C.C. (867 F. Supp. 11 (D.D.C. 1994) (investigation by the Federal Communications Commission for determining whether a license holder violated FCC rules); Ehringhaus v. F.T.C., 525 F. Supp. 21 (D.D.C. 1980) (investigation by the Federal Trade Commission into cigarette advertising practices); Mittleman v. Office of Personnel Management, 76 F.3d 1240 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (background investigation for an individual's security clearance).

The OIG is charged with investigating and correcting waste, fraud, or abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. See Inspector General Act of 1978, codified as amended at 5 U.S.C. app. §§ 2(1)-(2), 4(a)(1), (3)-(4), (d), 6(a)(1)-(4), 7(a), 9(a)(1)(E). Thus, we have consistently found that the OIG compiles information for law enforcement purposes within the meaning of Exemption 7. Scripps, 27 DOE at 80,648; Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1997); Keci Corporation, 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1997). Similarly, courts have found that the Inspector General's offices in other agencies exercise the requisite law enforcement functions to protect their investigatory files under Exemption 7. E.g., Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73 (D.C. Cir. 1974). We therefore reject Dr. Cherney's arguments, and find that the OIG's inquiry file was compiled for law enforcement purposes.

2. Whether Release of the Documents Could Reasonably be Expected to Interfere with Enforcement Proceedings

In order to withhold documents compiled for law enforcement purposes, the agency must show that disclosure of particular kinds of investigatory records while a case is pending would generally interfere with enforcement proceedings. NLRB v. Robbins Tire and Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 224 (1978) (NLRB);Solar Sources, 142 F.2d at 1037; Murray, Jacobs & Abel, 25 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1995) (Murray).

However, in asserting interference, the agency need not make a determination on a document-by-document basis. Instead, it may take a generic approach and “group documents into relevant categories that are sufficiently distinct to allow a court to grasp how each ... category of documents, if disclosed, would interfere with the investigation.” Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389, quoting Crooker v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, 789 F.2d 64, 67 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Crooker). An acceptable category must be functional; that is, it must allow a court to trace a rational link between the nature of the document and the alleged likely interference. Crooker, 789 F.2d at 64, 67. If the category of records is of the type that could reasonably be expected to interfere with enforcement proceedings generally, the agency need not make any particularized, document-specific showing of interference. NLRB, 437 U.S. at 224.

It is important to note that even though an agency "need not justify its withholding on a document-by-document basis in court, [it] must itself review each document to determine the category in which it properly belongs." Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389. Thus, when an agency elects to use the "generic" approach, it "has a three-fold task. First, it must define its categories functionally. Second, it must conduct a document-by-document review in order to assign the documents to the proper category. Finally, it must explain how the release of each category would interfere with enforcement proceedings." Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1389-90; Murray, Jacobs, and Abel, 25 DOE ¶ 80,130 at 80576 (1995).

We recognize that in categorizing the responsive material, "a tightrope must be walked: categories must be distinct enough to allow meaningful judicial review, yet not so distinct as prematurely to let the cat out of the investigative bag." Curran v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d 473 at 475 (1st Cir. 1987). However, courts have provided guidance as to what constitutes an adequate "generic category" for purposes of Exemption 7(A). The general principle uniting these decisions is that the "functional" description of the withheld material must be sufficient to indicate the type of interference threatening the law enforcement proceeding. Crooker, 789 F.2d at 67.

Thus, describing material withheld under Exemption 7 as "details regarding initial allegations giving rise to this investigation; notification of [FBI Headquarters] of the allegations and ensuing investigation; interviews with witnesses and subjects; [and] investigative reports furnished to the prosecuting attorneys," constitutes sufficient functional categories. Spannaus v. Department of Justice, 813 F.2d 1285 at 1287, 1289 (4th Cir. 1987). Similarly, functional categories describing withheld material as "identities of possible witnesses and informants, reports on the location and viability of potential evidence, and polygraph reports" are sufficient. Bevis, 801 F.2d at 1390.

On the other hand, categories describing material "only as 'teletypes,' 'airtels,' or 'letters'" are insufficient. Id. In following these principles, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia has determined that:

The ... descriptions of the materials withheld pursuant to Exemption 7(A) [as] "an administrative inquiry file which is currently pending" and "records or information [in an investigation file] that were garnered from an administrative inquiry ... which is still pending" ... are patently inadequate to permit the Court to determine whether Exemption 7(A) was properly invoked.

Putnam v. Department of Justice, 873 F. Supp. 705, 714 (D.D.C. 1995) (Putnam).

III. Conclusion

In its determination letter, OIG stated that it was withholding all responsive documents on the ground that "there has not been a final determination concerning this matter." We find that this explanation for withholding under Exemption 7(A), like the one rejected by the court in Putnam, does not describe a functional category or categories with sufficient detail to permit us to determine the type of interference threatening the law enforcement proceeding. Firearms Training Systems, 21 DOE ¶ 80,119 (1991); Stephen Quakenbush, 16 DOE ¶ 80,125 (1987). Because OIG did not conduct a document-by-document review to assign each document to a functional category, and did not explain how the release of information from a functional category would interfere with a law enforcement proceeding, we will remand this matter for a new determination.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Matthew Cherney, M.D., Case No. VFA-0493, is hereby granted as set forth in Paragraph 2 below.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Director of the Office of the Inspector General, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552 (a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Appellant: Vladeck, Waldman, Elias & Engelhard

Date of Filing: April 13, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0494

On April 13, 1999, Vladeck, Waldman, Elias & Engelhard (Appellant) filed an Appeal from a final determination issued on March 15, 1999 by the Department of Energy's Savannah River Operations Office (SR). In that determination, SR released several documents in response to a June 25, 1998 Request for Information concerning a DOE contractor's Affirmative Action Programs. This request was filed by the Appellant under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b), as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. In its determination, SR also withheld some responsive information under FOIA Exemption 4. This Appeal, if granted, would require SR to release the withheld information.

I. BACKGROUND

On March 15, 1999, SR issued a determination letter releasing several documents to the Appellant. However, SR withheld all or portions of ten documents under FOIA Exemptions 4 and 6. Determination Letter at 1. The present Appeal was submitted on April 13, 1999, challenging SR's withholdings under Exemption 4. (1)

II. ANALYSIS

The FOIA generally requires that records held by federal agencies be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3). However, the FOIA lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that an agency may withhold. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(1)-(b)(9); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(1)- (b)(9).

The only exemption at issue in the present case is found at 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4) (Exemption 4). Exemption 4 exempts from mandatory public disclosure "trade secrets and commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(4); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(4). In order to be withheld under Exemption 4, a document must contain either (a) trade secrets or (b) information that is "commercial" or "financial," "obtained from a person," and "privileged or confidential." National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Morton, 498 F.2d 765 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (National Parks). If the agency determines the material is a trade secret for the purposes of the FOIA, its analysis is complete and the material may be withheld under Exemption 4. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. Food & Drug Admin., 704 F.2d 1280, 1286, 1288 (D.C. Cir. 1983). If the material does not constitute a trade secret, a different analysis applies. First, the agency must determine whether the information in question is commercial or financial. It is well settled that any information relating to business or trade meets this criteria. See, e.g. Lepelletier v. FDIC, 977 F. Supp. 456, 459 (D.D.C. 1997) (appeal pending).

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has specifically held that the term "commercial" as used in the FOIA, includes anything "pertaining or relating to or dealing with commerce." American Airlines, Inc. v. National Mediation Bd., 588 F.2d 863, 870 (2d Cir. 1978). Next the agency must determine whether the information is "obtained from a person." It is well settled that information generated by the federal government is not "obtained from a person" and is therefore excluded from Exemption 4's coverage. See, e.g. Board of Trade v. Commodity Futures Trading Comm'n, 627 F.2d 392, 404 (D.C. Cir. 1980). Next the agency must determine whether the information is "privileged or confidential." If the information is subject to a valid claim of legal privilege on the part of its submitter, it may properly be withheld under Exemption 4.

In order to determine whether the information is "confidential" the agency must first decide whether the information was involuntarily or voluntarily submitted. If the information was voluntarily submitted, it may be withheld under Exemption 4 if the submitter would not customarily make such information available to the public. Critical Mass Energy Project v. Nuclear Regulatory Comm'n, 975 F.2d 871, 879 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (Critical Mass). If the information was involuntarily submitted, the agency must show that the information is likely to either (i) impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or (ii) cause substantial harm to the competitive position of the person from whom the information was obtained before withholding it under Exemption 4. National Parks, 498 F.2d 765 at 770; Critical Mass, 975 F.2d 871 at 879, cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (1993).

In addition, once an agency decides to withhold information, both the FOIA and the Department's regulations require the agency to provide a reasonably specific justification for its withholding. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6), 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1); Mead Data Central, Inc. v. Department of the Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977); National Parks & Conservation Ass'n v. Kleppe, 547 F.2d 673 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (Kleppe); Digital City Communications, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,149 at 80,657 (1997); Data Technology Industries, 4 DOE ¶ 80,118 (1979). This allows both the requester and this Office to determine whether the claimed exemption was accurately applied. Tri-State Drilling, Inc., 26 DOE ¶ 80,202 at 80,816 (1997). It also aids the requester in formulating a meaningful appeal and this Office in reviewing that appeal. Wisconsin Project on Nuclear Arms Control, 22 DOE ¶ 80,109 at 80,517 (1992).

Thus, if an agency withholds material under Exemption 4 because its disclosure is likely to cause substantial competitive harm, it must state the reasons for believing such harm will result. Larson Associated, Inc., 25 DOE ¶ 80,204 (1996); Milton L. Loeb, 23 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1993). On the other hand, conclusory and generalized allegations of substantial competitive harm are unacceptable and cannot support an agency's decision to withhold requested documents. Public Citizen Health Research Group v. F.D.A., 704 F.2d 1280, 1291 (D.C.Cir. 1983); Kleppe, 547 F.2d at 680 ("Conclusory and generalized allegations are indeed unacceptable as a means of sustaining the burden of nondisclosure under the FOIA").

We contacted SR to discuss its withholdings under Exemption 4. As a result of our discussions, SR has agreed to release a substantial portion of the information it originally withheld under Exemption 4. Specifically, SR agreed to release the documents identified by the Appellant as Request Nos. 1, 2, 7(a), 7(c), and 9. Accordingly, the portions of the present appeal relating to those documents are moot.

We turn now to our consideration of SR's withholding of the document identified by the Appellant as "Request No. 4: Letter re: WSRC Self Evaluation." During our discussions with SR about this document, SR advanced a justification for withholding under Exemption 4 different from the one it provided in the Determination Letter. Accordingly, we shall remand this matter to SR for a thorough articulation of this new justification for withholding.

SR also withheld a document described by the Appellant as: "Request No. 7b: WSRC Discrimination charges." After reviewing this document, we find that it cannot be withheld under Exemption 4. The document is a listing of discrimination charges filed against the DOE contractor tasked with the management and operation of DOE's Savannah River Site. The document, which was prepared by the DOE Contractor, lists each claim's filing date, the type of claim, the alleged discriminatory action, the agency that each claim was filed with and the status of each claim. In addition, the document lists the name, gender and race of each claimant. In our discussions, SR was unable to articulate how release of this document could reasonably be expected to cause its submitter substantial competitive harm. The only justification provided by SR in our discussions was that release of this information could result in an invasion of personal privacy. While that justification may be valid, it cannot be used to withhold information under Exemption 4. Moreover, any invasion of personal privacy could be prevented by providing the Appellant with a copy of this document with the individuals' names and other identifying information redacted.

Accordingly, on remand, SR should either release this document in its entirety or release a redacted version of it with a new determination letter that fully explains and justifies any withholdings or redactions.

We now turn our consideration to the document described by the Appellant as "Request No. 8: Craft Activity at SRS." SR has informed us that it released to the Appellant all of this document except for individuals' Social Security numbers, which it withheld under Exemption 6, and the wage rates that it pays members of certain professions. Since the Appellant is not appealing SR's withholdings under Exemption 6, we have confined our analysis of this document to SR's withholding of wage rates. SR explained that release of the wage rates could reasonably be expected to result in substantial harm to the submitter, a DOE Contractor. Specifically, SR indicated that release of this information would facilitate "raiding" of the submitter's staff by competitors. We agree. Accordingly, we are upholding SR's withholding of wage rates under Exemption 4.

Finally we turn our consideration to the documents described by the Appellant as "Request No. 10: Diversity findings from Towers Perrin Survey" and "Request No. 11: WSRC Executive Summary." SR agrees that its determination letter does not adequately justify the withholding of these documents and has therefore requested that this portion of the appeal be remanded to it so that it can provide a more thorough justification. We will therefore remand this portion of the appeal to SR for further action consistent with this determination.

III. CONCLUSION

We are remanding several portions of the present Appeal to SR, specifically, those portions of the Appeal concerning Request Nos. 4, 7b, 10 and 11. On remand, SR shall either release the withheld information or provide a new justification for withholding. If SR continues to withhold information under Exemption 4, it must explain which Exemption 4 test it is applying. In doing so, it must provide more than a simple restatement of the applicable test. Instead, it should include a statement of the reason for any withholding, and a brief explanation of how the exemption applies to the matter withheld. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.7(b)(1); William H. Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,221 at 80,861 (1997); Davis Wright & Jones, 19 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,510 (1989). Since SR has convinced us that the remainder of its withholdings under Exemption 4 were proper, the rest of the Appeal should be denied.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Vladeck, Waldman, Ellis & Engelhard, Case No. VFA-0494, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below and denied in all other aspects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Savannah River Operations Office, which shall issue a new determination in accordance with the instructions set forth above.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

Case No. VFA-0496, 27 DOE ¶ 80,210

June 7, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Sowell, Todd, Laffitte, Beard & Watson, L.L.C.

Date of Filing: May 10, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0496

Sowell, Todd, Laffitte, Beard & Watson, L.L.C. (Sowell Todd) filed an Appeal from a series of five determinations issued to the firm in March and April 1999, by a number of offices at Department of Energy (DOE) Headquarters and the DOE's Savannah River Operations Office (Savannah River). Those determinations, taken together, constitute the response to two requests for information that Sowell Todd filed with the DOE, dated November 23, 1998 and February 23, 1999, pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552. Altogether, the DOE identified more than 90 documents as responsive to the requests. Of that number, some were released to Sowell Todd in their entirety, some were withheld in whole or in part, and some have not yet been the subject of a determination regarding release. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release all responsive documents in their entirety.

The FOIA requires that documents held by federal agencies generally be released to the public upon request. The FOIA, however, lists nine exemptions that set forth the types of information that may be withheld at the discretion of the agency. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b). Those nine categories are repeated in the DOE regulations implementing the FOIA. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b). The DOE regulations further provide that documents exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. BACKGROUND

The November 19 request was directed by DOE Headquarters to the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) for response.(1) The OIG's determination is one of the five determinations that Sowell Todd has appealed. It was issued on March 23, 1999 (Case No. 9811230001) and it identified 63 documents as responsive to the request. Each of these documents was handled in one of four ways: (a) it was released in its entirety to Sowell Todd (five documents, including one released earlier); (b) it was referred to Savannah River, because that office created the document (some of these 25 documents contained OIG redactions under Exemptions 5, 6 or 7(C), or a combination of these exemptions, of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA)); (c) it was referred to the Office of Worker and Community Transition, because that office created the document (two documents); or (d) it was withheld in whole or in part under Exemption 5, 6 or 7(C), or a combination thereof (31 documents).

On April 14, 1999, Savannah River issued a partial determination with respect to the 25 documents that OIG referred to it. Savannah River named this case SR-99-020, and this is the second of the five determinations that Sowell Todd has appealed. In its determination, Savannah River released to the requester eight of the 25 documents in their entirety. The remaining 17 documents are still under consideration at this time. Because each of the documents was either released in full or is not yet the subject of a determination regarding its release, we find no grounds exist upon which to appeal this determination. OHA's jurisdiction in FOIA appeals extends only to cases where there has been a denial of a request for records. See 10 C.F.R. § 1004.8(a); David E. Ridenour, 27 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1998). We shall therefore dismiss that portion of Sowell Todd's appeal which relates to this determination letter. (2)

The Office of Worker and Community Transition responded to the November 19 request on April 8, 1999, and this response is the third of the five determinations under consideration on this appeal. Because this office released in their entirety the two documents that had been referred to it, there is no issue ripe for appellate review. We will therefore dismiss that portion of Sowell Todd's appeal which relates to this determination letter.

The fourth and fifth determination letters that Sowell Todd has appealed arise from a separate request that the firm submitted to Savannah River on February 23, 1999. In this request, Sowell Todd sought any documents regarding Savannah River's Voluntary Separation Program (VSP) and a review conducted by Savannah River to determine if violations of the VSP had occurred. This request was assigned Case No. SR-99-013. In a partial response to this request, on March 30, 1999, Savannah River identified 30 responsive documents, and released 25 of them in their entirety. This letter is the fourth of the five determinations that Sowell Todd has appealed and it challenges the withholding of portions of three of the five remaining documents under Exemption 6 of the FOIA. The other two responsive documents originated at Headquarters and, for that reason, Savannah River referred them to Headquarters for a determination.(3) Headquarters assigned the referral Case No. 9904070001. The fifth determination letter that Sowell Todd has appealed to us is one dated April 12, 1999 that advises the firm that the Office of the Executive Secretariat (DOE Headquarters) had received the referral from Savannah River; it contains no determination regarding the release of the two referred documents. Because the documents have not yet the subject of a determination regarding their release, no determination exists upon which an appeal can be taken, as discussed above. We therefore shall dismiss that portion of Sowell Todd's appeal which relates to this fifth determination letter.

This appeal, then, concerns the material withheld from 34 documents that the DOE identified as responsive to Sowell Todd's November 19, 1998 and February 23, 1999 requests.(4) OIG withheld information under Exemptions 5, 6, and 7(C) from 31 documents in its March 23, 1999 determination letter. Savannah River withheld information under Exemption 6 from three additional documents in its March 30, 1999 determination letter. All other responsive documents have either been released to Sowell Todd or are documents on which no release determinations have been completed. We have notified the affected offices that they should complete processing those documents as soon as possible.

In its appeal Sowell Todd argues that the application of Exemption 7(C) to the documents is inappropriate since the documents were not collected for law enforcement purposes. Additionally, it argues that material withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 was inappropriately withheld since release of such material would not constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Sowell Todd asserts that the release of the withheld material would be in the public interest. Lastly, Sowell Todd argues that the documents should be released in their entirety because the documents at issue will become the subject of "subsequent requests for substantially the same records under 5 U.S.C. § 552(2)(D)." Appeal Letter from Marcy W. Johnson, Sowell Todd, to Director, OHA (April 29, 1999) at 2.

II. ANALYSIS

We have reviewed each of the documents at issue in the present case. We find that OIG and Savannah River properly withheld pursuant to the FOIA the vast majority of the information redacted from the documents. However, we have also determined that there is a small amount of material that was not properly withheld pursuant to the exemptions cited in the OIG's determination letter.

As an initial matter, Sowell Todd has advanced a general argument that all of the documents should be released because they "are likely to become the subject of subsequent requests for substantially the same records under 5 U.S.C. § 552(2)(D)." Appeal Letter from Marcy W. Johnson, Sowell Todd, to Director, OHA (April 29, 1999) at 2. We were unable to find this statute. We assume, however, that Sowell Todd refers to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(2)(D) which states:

Each agency, in accordance with published rules shall make available for public inspection and copying . . . .copies of all records, regardless of form or format, which have been released to any person under paragraph (3) and which, because of the nature of their subject matter, the agency determines have become or are likely to become the subject of subsequent requests for substantially the same records . . .

5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(2)(D). This section provides that when agencies determine that previously released documents (including those released pursuant to the FOIA) might be the subject of future requests, such documents are to be made available for public inspection in an agency reading room or web site. This provision does not mandate that exemptions from mandatory disclosure become inapplicable to documents that are subjects of repeated FOIA requests. We therefore reject this argument.

A. Exemption 5

Exemption 5 of the FOIA exempts from mandatory disclosure documents that are "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(5). The Supreme Court has held that this provision exempts "those documents, and only those documents, normally privileged in the civil discovery context." NLRB v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 421 U.S. 132, 149 (1975) (Sears) (footnote omitted). The courts have identified three traditional privileges that fall under this definition of exclusion: the attorney-client privilege, the attorney work-product privilege and the executive "deliberative process" or "predecisional" privilege. Coastal States Gas Corp. v. Department of Energy, 617 F.2d 854, 862 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (Coastal States). Only the "deliberative process" privilege is at issue here.

The "deliberative process" privilege of Exemption 5 permits the government to withhold documents that reflect advisory opinions, recommendations, and deliberations comprising part of the process by which government formulates decisions and policies. Sears, 421 U.S. at 150. The ultimate purpose of the exemption is to protect the quality of agency decisions by promoting frank and independent discussion among those responsible for making governmental decisions. Sears, 421 U.S. at 151. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 87 (1973) (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. United States, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (Ct. Cl. 1958)) (Mink).

In order for Exemption 5 to shield a document, the document must be both predecisional, i.e., generated before the adoption of agency policy, and deliberative, i.e. reflecting the give-and-take of the consultative process. Coastal States, 617 F.2d at 866. The exemption thus covers documents that reflect, among other things, the personal opinion of the writer rather than the final policy of the agency. Id. Even then, however, the exemption only covers the subjective, deliberative portion of the document. Mink, 410 U.S. at 87-91. An agency must disclose factual information contained in the protected document unless the factual material is "inextricably intertwined" with the exempt material. Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1078 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

OIG withheld, in whole or in part, eight documents pursuant to Exemption 5's deliberative process privilege. (5) OIG Document No. 2, is a draft copy of a document entitled "Summary Abstract Report of Inspection on Allegation Regarding Voluntary Separation Program, Inspection No. S97IS030, Report No. " (Abstract). OIG Document No. 2 also contains a separate sheet ("Report Reference Sheet") detailing comments about the draft. The Abstract and Report Reference Sheet are predecisional and deliberative. Consequently, we conclude that most of the material was properly protected by Exemption 5. However, the Report Reference Sheet does contain a small amount of segregable factual material consisting of column headings, which should have been released to Sowell Todd. Additionally, the Abstract has some segregable material consisting of all section titles, other than those referring to an individual, and the address and signature blocks. Consequently, on remand OIG should either release this material or issue another determination explaining why this material is exempt pursuant to the FOIA. (6)

OIG Document No. 36 consists of two almost identical memoranda, one of which has been signed, transmitting a copy of a draft document entitled "Report on Inspection of an Allegation Regarding the Voluntary Separation Program at the Savannah River Operations Office" (Report). The memoranda do not appear to contain any deliberative material. Thus, the memoranda themselves are not withholdable pursuant to Exemption 5. The draft Report, however, contains predecisional, deliberative material that is protectable under Exemption 5. There is some segregable factual material, such as the title page and table of contents (other than the listings under "Findings and Recommendations"), which may be released. Additionally, most of the section titles in the Report may also be released except for those that are withholdable in the table of contents. On remand, OIG should either release this material or issue another determination explaining why this material may be withheld pursuant to the FOIA.

OIG Document No. 37 is two copies of a memorandum from Savannah River to OIG transmitting its one-page response to the draft Report. (7) While most of the memorandum itself contains predecisional, deliberative material describing Savannah River's opinions regarding the draft Report, there is some segregable non-deliberative material. Specifically, the address block, the first paragraph, as well as the last paragraph and all material below it on page one of the memorandum, consists of non-deliberative material not protectable pursuant to Exemption 5. With regard to the one-page response, the page titles and the first sentence are also non-deliberative and can be released. On remand, OIG should either release this material or issue another determination explaining why the material is withholdable under the FOIA.

OIG Document No. 51 consists of three pages describing suggested changes to the draft Report along with a copy of the draft Report with some suggested changes handwritten into the draft. The first three pages describing the suggested changes are predecisional and deliberative and are properly protected by Exemption 5. The handwritten comments on the draft Report are also protectable under Exemption 5. The remainder of the draft Report was properly withheld under Exemption 5 with the exceptions noted earlier (segregable material in the title page, table of contents and section headings).

OIG Document No. 54 consists of a draft copy of the Report and Abstract. As described earlier, these are basically predecisional, deliberative documents, which are properly protected by Exemption 5. However, there is a small amount of segregable factual material that can be separated as described in our discussion of OIG Document Nos. 2 and 36. On remand, OIG should either release this material or issue another determination letter explaining why this material can be withheld under the FOIA.

OIG Document No. 56 is a document entitled "Disposition Review: WSRC Voluntary Separation Program." Three sentences of this document were withheld pursuant to Exemption 5.(8) These sentences describe opinions of the author regarding the inspection and as such are predecisional and deliberative. Consequently, we find that OIG properly withheld them pursuant to Exemption 5. OIG Document No. 59 is a Memorandum of Interview authored by an OIG investigator. Two paragraphs were withheld pursuant to Exemption 5. The paragraphs consists of a report indicating with whom the inspector spoke and the substance of their conversations. This material is not deliberative and as such is not protectable under Exemption 5. On remand, OIG should either release the material withheld in OIG Document No. 59 pursuant to Exemption 5 or issue another determination explaining why this material may be withheld under the FOIA.

OIG Document No. 62 is a one page handwritten note that contains various items apparently relating to the inspection at Savannah River. Because it is unclear from the document itself if these items represent information obtained in the inspection or represent opinions of the author, we will remand this document to OIG so that, on remand, it may issue a more detailed determination explaining why this document should be protected under Exemption 5 or another FOIA exemption. If OIG decides that no FOIA exemption is applicable, then the document should be released.

B. Exemptions 6 and 7(C)

1. OIG Documents

OIG withheld portions of 25 documents pursuant to both Exemptions 6 and 7(C).(9) In these documents, OIG withheld identifying information such as, names, job titles and salary information mentioned in these documents. (10)

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(6); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982). Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii).

In order to determine whether a record may be withheld under either Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether or not a significant privacy interest would be compromised by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either of the exemptions. See Ripskis v. Department of Hous. and Urban Dev., 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripskis). Second, the agency must determine whether or not release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. See Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press v. Department of Justice, 489 U.S. 749 (1989) (Reporters Committee). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether release of the record either (1) would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or (2) could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). See generally Ripskis, 746 F.2d at 3 (Exemption 6); Stone v. FBI, 727 F. Supp. 662, 663-64 (D.D.C. 1990) (Exemption 7(C)).

We have previously considered cases in which both Exemption 6 and 7(C) were invoked, and we stated that in such cases, provided the Exemption 7 threshold requiring a valid law enforcement purpose is met, we would analyze the withholding only under Exemption 7(C), the broader of the two exemptions. See, e.g., K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1992). Since, as discussed below, all of the documents involved here were compiled for law enforcement purposes, any document that satisfies Exemption 7(C)'s "reasonableness" standard may be protected. Conversely, documents not protected by Exemption 7(C) will be unable to satisfy Exemption 6's more restrictive requirement that they constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

The threshold test for withholding information under Exemption 7(C) is whether such information is compiled as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. FBI v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982). Sowell Todd asserts that OIG is not a law enforcement agency and thus Exemption 7(C) may not be invoked to withhold material in the OIG documents.

The scope of Exemption 7 encompasses enforcement of both civil and criminal statutes. Rural Housing Alliance v. Department of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 81 & n.46 (D.C. Cir. 1974). By law, OIG is charged with investigating waste, fraud, and abuse in programs and operations administered or financed by the DOE. 5 U.S.C. Appendix 3 § 4. OIG is therefore a classic example of an organization with a clear law enforcement mandate. Ortiz v. Department of Health and Human Services, 70 F.3d 729, 732-33 (2d Cir. 1995) (Ortiz) and cases cited therein. In the present case, the OIG Documents were created pursuant to an investigation of alleged misconduct concerning the Voluntary Separation Program at DOE's facility at Savannah River. Consequently, the OIG Documents at issue were created for a law enforcement purpose.(11)

(i) Privacy Interest

Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals mentioned in law enforcement files, whether they be suspects, witnesses or investigators. See, e.g., Fitzgibbon v. CIA, 911 F.2d 755, 767 (D.C. Cir. 1990); Computer Professionals for Social Responsibility v. United States Secret Service, 72 F.3d 897, 904 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (Computer Professionals). Accordingly, we find that the individuals whose identities were withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

(ii) Public Interest in Disclosure

In its appeal, Sowell Todd argues that release of all the withheld information in the documents would be in the public interest but does not specifically articulate how disclosure would be in the public interest. In Reporters Committee, the Supreme Court found that in FOIA contexts, the public interest in disclosure must be measured in terms of its relation to the FOIA's basic purpose. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 772. The Court identified the basic purpose of the FOIA as "'to open agency action to the light of public scrutiny.'" Id. (quoting Department of Air Force v. Rose, 425 U.S. 352, 372 (1976)). Therefore, the Court held that official information that sheds light on an agency's performance of its statutory duties falls squarely within the FOIA's statutory purpose. Id. at 773. The Court further found that information about private citizens that is contained in government files but reveals little or nothing about an agency's own conduct does not further the basic purpose of the FOIA. Id. After examining the documents in question, it is not apparent that release of the individuals' names and identifying information would contribute to the public's understanding of the DOE's behavior or performance in carrying out its duties. Thus, in the present case, we conclude there is little or no public interest in the disclosure of the names and identifying information withheld in the documents at issue in the present case.

(iii) The Balancing Test

Because release of the individuals' names or other identifying information could reasonably be expected to subject them to harassment or intimidation or other personal intrusions, we find that significant privacy interests exist for these individuals. After weighing the significant privacy interests present in this case against little or no public interest, we find that release of information revealing the individuals' identities could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Consequently, we find that the OIG properly withheld the information redacted from OIG Document Nos. 4, 5, 13, 14, 18, 21-24, 27-31, 33, 34, 41, 45, 47-50, 56, 59 and 63 under Exemptions 6 and 7(C).

2. SR Documents

Savannah River withheld the names of individuals from SR Document Nos. 11d, 13 and 13a pursuant to Exemption 6 alone. SR Document No. 11d is a letter responding to the OIG's inspection of Savannah River's Voluntary Separation Program. This letter explains the process of how a particular person's application for the Voluntary Separation Program was handled. SR Documents Nos. 13 and 13a consist of a letter and attachment in which another individual's subcontracting costs have been deemed to be unallowable and the charges have been withdrawn from Westinghouse Savannah River Corporation (WSRC), the Management and Operating contractor at Savannah River. Only the individuals' names are withheld in each of these documents.

The individual named in SR Document 11d has a strong privacy interest in keeping his or her identity private especially in light of the fact that his or her name is mentioned in response to an OIG investigation.

The individual mentioned in SR Document Nos. 13 and 13a has a lesser privacy interest in not having his or her name associated with the improper charging of WSRC for costs related to the individual's services. As discussed above, we balance these privacy interests against whether or not release of the documents would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the Government. In this case, we find no public interest which would be furthered by release of the names withheld in the SR Documents since the names would add little or no additional information about DOE's own conduct. Because release of the withheld names in SR Document Nos. 11d, 13 and 13a would not further the public interest and because the individuals have privacy interests in keeping their names private, we find that release of the names in the SR Documents would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Consequently, we believe that Savannah River properly applied Exemption 6 to SR Documents Nos. 11d, 13 and 13a.

C. The Public Interest in Disclosure of the Withheld Material

The DOE regulations provide that the DOE should release to the public material exempt from mandatory disclosure under the FOIA if the DOE determines that federal law permits disclosure and it is in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. Notwithstanding our finding that OIG properly applied Exemption 5 to a portion of the requested information, we must consider whether the public interest nevertheless demands disclosure of the Exemption 5 material pursuant to 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1. In applying this regulation, we note that the Department of Justice has reviewed its administration of the FOIA and adopted a "foreseeable harm" standard for defending FOIA exemptions. Memorandum from the Attorney General to Heads of Departments and Agencies, Subject: The Freedom of Information Act (October 4, 1993) (Reno Memorandum). The Reno Memorandum indicates that whether or not there is a legally correct application of an exemption, it is the policy of the Department of Justice to defend the assertion of a FOIA exemption only in those cases where the agency articulates a reasonably foreseeable harm to an interest protected by that exemption. See Reno Memorandum at 1, 2. With regard to the material properly withheld in this matter pursuant to Exemption 5, the requested information consists of the opinions and recommendations of OIG investigators regarding an OIG inspection. The release of this information would in our opinion impair the willingness of OIG investigators to make frank statements of opinion on sensitive issues such as whether individuals or DOE entities have committed violations of DOE regulations. Therefore such release would seriously impede OIG's ability to investigate fraud, waste and abuse in DOE programs. Consequently, we find that this harm satisfies the reasonably foreseeable harm standard articulated by the Attorney General and that the release of the material protected pursuant to Exemption 5 contained in the requested documents would not be in the public interest. We need not make a determination of this sort with respect to the information withheld under Exemptions 6 and 7(C) because, as discussed above, we have already considered the public interest in release of that information.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Sowell, Todd, Laffitte, Beard & Watson, L.L.C. on May 6, 1998, Case No. VFA-0496, is hereby dismissed with respect to the determinations that the DOE's Savannah River Operations Office issued on April 14, 1999 and the DOE's Office of Worker and Community Transition issued on April 8, 1999. The Appeal is also dismissed with regard to the letter issued on April 12, 1999 by the Office of the Executive Secretariat. The Appeal is hereby granted in part as set forth in Paragraph (2) and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is remanded to the Department of Energy's Office of Inspector General for further consideration in accordance with the instructions contained in the foregoing decision.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)This request was also directed to Savannah River, which responded separately on January 25, 1999, in Case No. SR-98-073, with the release of three documents. Sowell Todd has not appealed this determination.

(2)If a requester does not receive a response at the end of the 20-day period, the requester may deem his administrative remedies as exhausted and has a right to a review in a district court of the United States. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B), (6)(A)(i), and (6)(C)(i); cf. Pollack v. Department of Justice, 49 F.3d 115, 118-19 (4th Cir. 1995) cert. denied, 516 U.S. 843 (1995) (decided under prior 10-day deadline).

(3)In a final response to the February 23, 1999 request, Savannah River issued a determination on April 12, 1999, in which it identified another document responsive to the request. That document was withheld in part under Exemption 5 of the FOIA. Sowell Todd has not appealed this determination.

(4)The documents as to which OIG issued a determination regarding in its March 23, 1999 letter and that are the subject of this appeal will be referred to as "OIG Documents." The documents on which SR issued a final determination in its March 30, 1999 letter and which are the subject of this appeal will be refereed to as "SR Documents." This appeal will review the DOE's determinations regarding OIG Document Nos. 2, 4, 5, 13, 14, 18, 21-24, 27-31, 33, 34, 36, 37, 41, 45, 47-51, 54, 56, 59, 62 and 63 as well as SR Document Nos. 11d, 13 and 13a.

(5)OIG Document Nos. 2, 36, 37, 51, 54 and 62 were withheld in their entirety pursuant to Exemption 5. OIG Document Nos. 56 and 59 were withheld in part pursuant to Exemption 5.

(6)OIG informed us that its policy with regard to draft documents deemed responsive to a FOIA request is to generally withhold them in their entirety since the material that is releasable, specifically, portions of the drafts that are expressly incorporated into the final version of a document, are already in the possession in the requester when he or she receives the final version of the document. The OIG determination letter informs the requester that if he or she wishes a redacted portion of a draft document OIG will promptly issue a redacted version of the draft document. Because we are remanding this matter to OIG so that non-deliberative material can be released to Sowell Todd, OIG should also review all of the material withheld pursuant to Exemption 5 as described in its determination letter and release any material that has been expressly adopted in any final versions of OIG documents articulating a final agency position. See Sears, 421 U.S. at 161 (documents lose protection of deliberative process privilege if such documents are expressly adopted or incorporated by reference).

(8)Other portions of this document as well as OIG Document No. 59 were withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C). These withholdings are discussed in the next section infra.

(9)The OIG documents which had material withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C) were OIG Document Nos. 4, 5, 13, 14, 18, 21-24, 27-31, 33, 34, 41, 45, 47-50, 56, 59 and 63. This material consists of documents such as Memoranda of Interviews with various individuals, OIG memoranda to the file and the working papers of OIG investigators.

(10)One handwritten sentence withheld at the bottom of OIG Document No. 22 does not relate to any individual and as such does not implicate any privacy interest. Consequently, it is not protectable pursuant to Exemption 6 or 7(C). However, because the withheld segment refers to an investigator's deliberative, predecisional analysis of the investigation, we find that it may nevertheless be withheld pursuant to Exemption 5.

(11)Because the SR documents were withheld pursuant to Exemption 6 alone we will specifically discuss the applicability of Exemption 6 to those documents infra.

Case No. VFA-0497, 27 DOE ¶ 80,208

May 26, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner:Gary S. Foster

Date of Filing:May 10, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0497

On May 10, 1999, Gary S. Foster (the Appellant) filed an Appeal from a determination the Authorizing Official of the Department of Energy's Oak Ridge Operations Office (DOE/OR) issued to him on April 22, 1999. In that determination, the Authorizing Official stated that DOE did not possess records responsive to the request for information that the Appellant filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The Authorizing Official further stated that the records were owned by a DOE contractor. In his Appeal, the Appellant asserts that DOE/OR's search for records was inadequate. Further, he stated that even if the requested records were owned by a DOE contractor, they should be subject to release under the FOIA.

Background

In his April 13, 1999 request for information, the Appellant sought photographs that were taken as a result of a concern regarding health and safety practices (known as an employee concern) that he had filed with a DOE office, the Employee Concerns office (EC). The photos were of locations the Appellant identified in his employee concern as possibly containing beryllium. With his request, he included the employee concern report issued by EC which noted that these photos were taken by a photographer with the Lockheed Martin Energy Systems, Inc. (LMES) General Counsel. In her determination, the Authorizing Official stated that no agency records exist regarding this request since the photos were solely owned by either Lockheed Martin Energy Research Corporation or LMES. She further stated that DOE did not possess copies of the photos and her search had not extended to the files of the contractor. Therefore, she denied the request. The Appellant responded that he believes copies of the photos exist at EC and therefore DOE/OR's search was inadequate. In addition, he argued that these photos were created using taxpayers' funds, and thus should be subject to release under the FOIA. Finally, he noted that since DOE should be able to get access to the contractor's records, the records should be considered to be agency records. In addition, he wanted to know why DOE/OR searches contractor-possessed records for some FOIA requests but did not in his case.

Analysis

We have held that a FOIA request deserves a thorough and conscientious search for responsive documents. When we have found that a search was inadequate, we have consistently remanded the case and ordered a further search for responsive documents. E.g., Native Americans for a Clean Environment, 23 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1993); Marlene R. Flor, 23 DOE ¶ 80,130 (1993); Eugene Maples, 23 DOE ¶ 80,106 (1993). However, the FOIA requires that a search be reasonable, not exhaustive. "The standard of reasonableness that we apply to the agency search procedures does not require absolute exhaustion of files; instead it requires a search reasonably calculated to uncover the sought materials." Miller v. Department of State, 779 F.2d 1378, 1384-85 (8th Cir. 1985).

We contacted DOE/OR to determine how it conducted the search. We learned that DOE/OR began its search with the LMES photographer who took the requested photos. The photographer informed DOE/OR that the photos were taken at the direction of the LMES General Counsel. The General Counsel had requested that these photos be taken for use in defending LMES against potential charges of evidence destruction in workers' compensation litigation concerning alleged beryllium exposure. The photos have at all times remained in LMES' sole possession. Records of Telephone Conversations between Amy Rothrock, Authorizing Official, DOE/OR, and Dawn L. Goldstein, Staff Attorney, Office of Hearings and Appeals (May 12 and 24, 1999). We believe that LMES was the logical starting place for DOE/OR's search, since the Appellant had included the Employee Concerns report which stated that the photos were taken by an LMES photographer. When Ms. Rothrock found out from LMES that the contractor had never circulated its files to any DOE office, it was reasonable for her to stop her search. We therefore find that DOE/OR conducted an adequate search of records in its possession.

We then inquired whether documents in the possession of LMES might be subject to mandatory release under the FOIA or DOE regulations. The Appellant asserted in his Appeal that all taxpayer- funded records are subject to release under the FOIA. This assertion is incorrect. See International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 27 DOE ¶ 80,152 at 80,620 (1998). Our threshold inquiry in this case is whether any of the requested records are "agency records," and thus subject to the FOIA, under the criteria set out by the federal courts. Cf. 5 U.S.C. § 552(f) (describing the scope of the term "agency" under the FOIA). Second, records that do not meet these criteria can nonetheless be subject to release under the DOE regulations. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e); see 59 Fed. Reg. 63,884 (December 12, 1994). For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that these LMES-possessed photos never became "agency records" of DOE's, and are instead the exclusive property of the contractor. Therefore, they are not subject to release under either the FOIA or DOE regulations.

The statutory language of the FOIA does not define the essential attributes of "agency records," but merely lists examples of the types of information agencies must make available to the public. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). In interpreting this phrase, we have applied a two-step analysis fashioned by the courts for determining whether documents created by non-federal organizations, such as LMES, are subject to the FOIA. See, e.g., BMF Enterprises, 21 DOE ¶ 80,127 (1991); William Albert Hewgley, 19 DOE ¶ 80,120 (1989); Judith M. Gibbs, 16 DOE ¶ 80,133 (1987) (Gibbs). That analysis involves a determination (i) whether the organization is an "agency" for purposes of the FOIA and, if not, (ii) whether the requested material is nonetheless an "agency record." See Gibbs, 16 DOE at 80,595-96.

The FOIA defines the term "agency" to include any "executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch . . . , or any independent regulatory agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(f). The courts have identified certain factors to consider in determining whether we should regard an entity as an agency for purposes of federal law. In United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976) (Orleans), a case that involved a statute other than the FOIA, the Supreme Court defined the conditions under which a private organization must be considered a federal agency as follows: "[T]he question here is not whether the . . . agency receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government." Id. at 815. In other words, an organization will be considered a federal agency only where its structure and daily operations are subject to substantial federal control. See Ciba-Geigy Corp. v. Matthews, 428 F. Supp. 523, 528 (S.D.N.Y. 1977). Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the Orleans standard provides the appropriate basis for ascertaining whether an organization is an "agency" in the context of a FOIA request for "agency records." Forsham v. Harris, 445 U.S. 169, 180 (1980) (Forsham). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. HEW, 504 F.2d 238, 248 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 963 (1975) (degree of independent governmental decision-making authority considered); Rocap v. Indiek, 539 F.2d 174 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

LMES is a privately owned and operated company. While the DOE exercises general control over the contract work performed by LMES, it does not supervise the company's day-to-day operations. See Contract No. DE-AC05-84OR21400. We therefore conclude that LMES is not an "agency" subject to the FOIA. Radian International, 26 DOE ¶ 80,126 (1996).

Although LMES is not an agency for the purposes of the FOIA, the requested photos could be considered "agency records" if the DOE obtained them and they were within the DOE's control at the time the Appellant made his FOIA request. Department of Justice v. Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. 136, 144-46 (1989) (Tax Analysts); see Kissinger v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 445 U.S. 136 (1980); Forsham, 445 U.S. at 182. In this case, we have determined that none of the photos the Appellant seeks was in the agency's control at the time of his request. See May 12, 1999 Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein. Based on these facts, these documents clearly do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86.

Nevertheless, the Appellant also argues that because he believes that DOE/OR could get access to the photos, this should suffice to make them “agency records.” However, access alone is not enough to make a record an “agency record” for FOIA purposes. As stated in Tax Analysts, it is the agency’s assertion of control over a record that could potentially convert a record in a private contractor’s possession into an “agency record.” The Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has enumerated the factors used to determine when this situation has occurred: (1) the intent of the document’s creator to retain or relinquish control over the records; (2) the ability of the agency to use and dispose of the record as it sees fit; (3) the extent to which agency personnel have read or relied upon the document; and (4) the degree to which the document was integrated into the agency’s record system or files. Burka v. Department of Health & Human Serv., 87 F.3d 508, 515 (D.C. Cir. 1996). None of these control-indicating facts has been shown to be present in the case at issue. As explained above, the photos relevant to this case were excluded from DOE’s ownership and ability to dispose of such records, and have remained exclusively in the contractor’s control. Accordingly, the requested photos do not qualify as "agency records" under the test set forth by the federal courts. See Tax Analysts, 492 U.S. at 145-46; see also Forsham, 445 U.S. at 185-86. See also The Cincinnati Enquirer, 26 DOE ¶ 80,205 (1997).

Even if contractor-acquired or contractor-generated records fail to qualify as "agency records," they may still be subject to release if the contract between DOE and that contractor provides that the document in question is the property of the agency. The DOE regulations provide that "[w]hen a contract with the DOE provides that any records acquired or generated by the contractor in its performance of the contract shall be the property of the Government, the DOE will make available to the public such records that are in the possession of the Government or the contractor, unless the records are exempt from public disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)." 10 C.F.R. 1004.3(e)(1). We therefore next look to the contract between DOE and LMES to determine the status of the requested records. That contract generally states,

Except as is provided in paragraph (b) of this clause, all records acquired or generated by the Contractor in its performance of this contract shall be the property of the Government . . .

Contract No. DE-AC05-84OR21400, Section H.30 (a). Therefore, unless the photos reasonably fall within the excluded categories of documents described in Paragraph (b), they will be considered the property of DOE and potentially releasable under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3(e).

We conclude that the photos fall within Paragraphs (b)(7) and (b)(8) of the ownership of records section of the contract. Paragraph (b)(7) excludes “internal legal files” from government ownership. Paragraph (b)(8) states that “files involving litigation by or against the Contractor with respect to which the costs are unallowable” are owned by the contractor. Ms. Rothrock has informed us that LMES’ litigation costs for the workers’ compensation claims are not reimbursed by DOE. Record of Telephone Conversation between Amy Rothrock and Dawn L. Goldstein (May 12, 1999). Accordingly, because LMES owns the photos, we find that they are not subject to release under the DOE regulations.

Finally, it is clear that DOE/OR could not search LMES' files for the requested records, as it has done in other cases. In the case cited by the Appellant in his Appeal, Burlin McKinney, 26 DOE ¶ 80,215 (1997), the requester sought records relating to beryllium. Such records would not, on their face, appear to fall within one of the categories of contractor-owned records laid out in the DOE/LMES contract. Therefore, in that case, DOE/OR was obligated to conduct a search of those LMES records which were DOE-owned. In the instant case, DOE/OR was able to determine based on its conversations with LMES that the photos are in fact contractor-owned and not subject to release under the FOIA or DOE regulations. Thus, no search of LMES' records was necessary.

Accordingly, since DOE/OR conducted an adequate search, and the requested photos are neither "agency records" nor subject to release under 10 C.F.R. § 1004.3, we must deny the Appeal at issue.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Gary S. Foster on May 10, 1999, Case No. VFA-0497, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought either in the district where the requester resides or has a principal place of business or in which the agency records are situated or in the District of Columbia.

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Jeffrey Walburn

Date of Filing: June 14, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0498

This Decision and Order concerns an Appeal that Jeffrey Walburn filed from a determination issued by the Department of Energy's (DOE) Office of Inspector General (OIG). In this determination, OIG granted in part a request for information that Mr. Walburn filed pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release.

In his FOIA request, Mr. Walburn asked for copies of any and all documents contained in investigation file number I98RR059. In its determination, OIG released certain documents in part, withholding segments of those documents pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C) of the FOIA. Exemption 6 protects from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . " Exemption 7(C) provides that "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes" may be withheld from disclosure, but only to the extent that the production of such documents "could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy . . . " In addition to the material withheld under these exemptions, OIG went on to state that "[d]ocuments 4, 9 through 36 and 38 through 40 are not being processed back to you since these documents were either written by you or addressed to you." Determination at 2.

In his Appeal, Mr. Walburn contests the OIG's "withholding" of documents 10, 21 through 23, 30 through 36, and 38. According to the determination letter, all of these documents were either generated by Mr. Walburn or addressed to him. Mr. Walburn subsequently informed us that he does not have copies of these documents. See memorandum of June 30, 1999 telephone conversation between Mr. Walburn and

Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney. In response to Mr. Walburn's Appeal, OIG informed us that it wished to review these documents to determine whether they should be released under the FOIA.(1) See memorandum of July 7, 1999 telephone conversation between Robert Palmer, OHA Staff Attorney, and Ruby Isla, OIG.

We believe that OIG's policy in FOIA matters regarding documents previously provided to, or originating from, a FOIA requester is reasonable and in most instances reflects the wishes of the requester. However, in this case, the requester has made it clear that he seeks copies of all responsive documents, including those that he authored or that were previously provided to him. Since the FOIA does not exempt such documents from its provisions, we will remand this matter to the OIG for a determination regarding these materials. On remand, OIG should consider making available to Mr. Walburn copies of any relevant documents that were previously and properly provided to him. Any applicable FOIA exemptions have probably been waived with respect to such information. See, e.g., Hanford Advisory Board, 26 DOE ¶ 80,216 (1997). With regard to documents written by Mr. Walburn, we have previously found that the DOE may sometimes withhold information that is exempt under the FOIA, even if that material was authored by the requester. See, e.g., David E. Ridenour, 27 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1998). If OIG seeks to invoke Exemptions 6 or 7 with respect to documents he authored, however, it should take into account the source of the withheld material in assessing the privacy interests that are involved.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Jeffrey Walburn, Case No. VFA-0498, is hereby granted as specified in Paragraph (2) below, and is denied in all other respects.

(2) This matter is hereby remanded to the Office of the Inspector General for further action in accordance with the instructions set forth in the above Decision and Order.

(3) This is a final Order of the Department of Energy from which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)Apparently, such a review did not occur during OIG's consideration of Mr. Walburn's request because it was believed that the documents were already in his possession.

Case No. VFA-0499, 27 DOE ¶ 80,215

July 7, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: Frank E. Isbill

Date of Filing: May 28, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0499

On May 28, 1999, Frank E. Isbill (Isbill) filed an Appeal from a determination that the Office of the Inspector General (IG) of the Department of Energy (DOE) issued to him. In that determination, the IG released copies of some documents in their entirety, released some with redactions, and withheld one in its entirety. The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the DOE in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004. This Appeal, if granted, would require the DOE to release the withheld information.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA which set forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.

I. Background

In 1998, Isbill wrote to the FOIA/Privacy Act Division at DOE headquarters and requested all records and information pertaining to his complaints about fraud and mismanagement to DOE's Office of Scientific and Technical Information in Oak Ridge, Tennessee from February 1, 1997 to the time of his request. Letter from Isbill to DOE (June 9, 1998). The FOIA/Privacy Act Division forwarded the request to the IG. The IG conducted a search of its files and located 74 responsive documents. On February 25, 1999, the OIG notified Isbill in a determination letter that it was releasing 11 documents in their entirety, withholding Document 68 in its entirety, and making a partial disclosure of 18 other documents. (1) Material in each of the 18 documents was withheld pursuant to FOIA Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Additionally, material in Documents 1, 6, 28, 42, 67, 73, and 74 was withheld pursuant to Exemption 7(D). Nine additional documents originated in other offices and were transferred to those offices, which were instructed to contact Isbill directly. (2) In this Appeal, Isbill challenges the IG's withholding of names and documents.

II. Analysis

A. Exemptions 6 and 7(C)

Exemption 6 shields from disclosure "[p]ersonnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." 5 U.S.C.§ 552(b)(6); 10 C. F. R. § 1004.10(b)(6). The purpose of Exemption 6 is to "protect individuals from the injury and embarrassment that can result from the unnecessary disclosure of personal information." Department of State v. Washington Post Co., 456 U.S. 595, 599 (1982).

Exemption 7(C) allows an agency to withhold "records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes, if release of such law enforcement records or information . . . could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(C); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iii). The threshold requirement in any Exemption 7 inquiry is whether the documents are compiled for law enforcement purposes, that is, as part of or in connection with an agency law enforcement proceeding. See William Payne, 26 DOE ¶ 80,144 (1996); F.B.I. v. Abramson, 456 U.S. 615, 622 (1982) (Abramson). The IG is a law enforcement body charged with investigating and correcting waste, fraud or abuse in programs administered or financed by the DOE. See Inspector General Act of 1978, codified as amended at 5 U.S.C. app. §§ 2(1)-(2), 4(a)(1), (3)-(4), (d), 6(a)(1)-(4), 7(a), 9(a)(1)(E). As a result of its duties, we find that the IG compiles reports involving official misconduct for "law enforcement purposes" within the meaning of Exemption 7(C). See Burlin McKinney, 25 DOE ¶ 80,149 (1995).

In order to determine whether information may be withheld under Exemption 6 or 7(C), an agency must undertake a three-step analysis. First, the agency must determine whether a significant privacy interest would be invaded by the disclosure of the record. If no privacy interest is identified, the record may not be withheld pursuant to either exemption. Ripskis v. Department of HUD, 746 F.2d 1, 3 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Ripkis). Second, the agency must determine whether release of the document would further the public interest by shedding light on the operations and activities of the government. See Hopkins v. Department of HUD, 929 F.2d 81, 88 (2d Cir. 1991); Department of Justice v. Reporters Comm. for Freedom of the Press, 489 U.S. 749 (1989) (Reporters Committee); FLRA v. Department of Treasury Financial Management Service, 884 F.2d 1446, 1451 (D.C. Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 864 (1990). Finally, the agency must weigh the privacy interests it has identified against the public interest in order to determine whether the release of the record would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 6 standard), or could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (the Exemption 7(C) standard). Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 762-770. See generally Ripkis, 746 F.2d at 3 (Exemption 6); Stone v. FBI, 727 F. Supp. 662, 663-663 (D.D.C. 1990) (Exemption 7(C)).

We have previously considered cases in which both Exemptions 6 and 7(C) were invoked, and we stated that in such cases, providing the Exemption 7 threshold requiring a valid law enforcement purpose is met, we would analyze the withholding only under Exemption 7(C), the broader of the two exemptions. See, e.g., David Ridenour, 27 DOE ¶ 80,143 (1998); Richard Levernier, 26 DOE ¶ 80,182 (1997); K.D. Moseley, 22 DOE ¶ 80,124 (1992). Since, as discussed below, all of the responsive documents that were withheld pursuant to Exemptions 6 and 7(C) were also compiled for law enforcement purposes, any document that satisfies Exemption 7(C)'s "reasonableness" standard will be protected. Conversely, documents not protected by Exemption 7(C) will be unable to satisfy Exemption 6's more restrictive requirement that they constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

1. Privacy Interest

In its determination, the IG stated that the withheld portions of the responsive documents contain names and information that would tend to disclose the identity of certain individuals involved in the IG investigation of Isbill's complaints. According to the IG, these individuals are "entitled to privacy protections so that they will be free from harassment, intimidation and other personal intrusions." Determination Letter at 1.

This office reviewed all of the documents that were withheld from Isbill. Those documents contained many names of individuals who had some relation to the investigation. Because of the obvious possibility of harassment, intimidation, or other personal intrusions, the courts have consistently recognized significant privacy interests in the identities of individuals providing information to government investigators. See Department of State v. Ray, 502 U.S. 154, 176 (1991) ("[t]he invasion of privacy becomes significant when personal information is linked to particular interviewees"); Safecard Services, Inc., v. S.E.C., 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Safecard);Blumberg, Seng, Ikeda & Albers, 25 DOE ¶ 80,124 at 80,563 (1995); James Schwab, 21 DOE ¶ 80,117 at 80,556 (1991). Therefore, we find that the individuals whose identities are being withheld in this case have significant privacy interests in maintaining their confidentiality.

2. Public Interest in Disclosure

Having established the existence of a privacy interest, the next step is to determine whether there is a public interest in disclosure. The Supreme Court has held that there is a public interest in disclosure of information that "sheds light on an agency's performance of its statutory duties." Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 773. See Marlene Flor, 26 DOE ¶ 80,104 at 80,511 (1996) (Flor). The requester has the burden of establishing that disclosure would serve the public interest. Flor, 26 DOE at 80,511 (quoting Carter v. Department of Commerce, 830 F.2d 388 (D.C. Cir. 1987)). It is well settled that disclosure of the identity of individuals who have provided information to government investigators is not "affected with the public interest." See, e.g., Safecard, 926 F.2d at 1205. In his Appeal, Isbill did not offer any explanation of why he believes release of the material would be in the public interest. In fact, he did not address this issue at all. Therefore, we find that there is no public interest in the disclosure of the responsive material.

3. The Balancing Test

In determining whether the disclosure of law enforcement records could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, courts have used a balancing test, weighing the privacy interests that would be infringed against the public interest in disclosure. Reporters Committee, 489 U.S. at 762 (1989); Safecard, 926 F.2d 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1991).

We have concluded above that there is a cognizable privacy interest at stake in this case. Moreover, we found that Isbill has not provided any information about the existence of a public interest in the disclosure of the withheld information. After a thorough examination of the responsive material, we found no public interest in the withheld material. Therefore, we find that the public interest in disclosure of the withheld material is outweighed by the real and identifiable privacy interests of the named individuals.

B. Exemption 7(D)

The IG also invoked the protection of Exemption 7(D) in withholding information in eight documents from Isbill. Exemption 7(D) protects from mandatory disclosure records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes that could reasonably be expected to disclose the identity of a confidential source who furnished information on a confidential basis. 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7)(D); 10 C.F.R. § 1004.10(b)(7)(iv). Exemption 7(D) is meant to protect confidential sources from retaliation that may result from the disclosure of their participation in law enforcement activities, and to encourage cooperation with law enforcement agencies by enabling the agencies to keep their informants' identities confidential. Ortiz v. Department of Health and Human Services, 70 F.3d 729, 732 (2d Cir. 1995) (Ortiz). "A source is confidential if the source provided information under an express assurance of confidentiality or in circumstances from which such an assurance could be reasonably inferred." Id., citing U.S. v. Landano, 508 U.S. 165; 113 S. Ct. 2014, 2019 (1993). We reviewed Document 68, the unredacted document in which the source first requested confidentiality, and we also reviewed other material where the IG referred to this request. We conclude that an assurance of confidentiality could be reasonably inferred from the correspondence in the file. Accordingly, we find that the IG properly withheld the identity of the confidential source under Exemption 7(D).(3)

C. Segregability

The FOIA requires that "[a]ny reasonably segregable portion of a record shall be provided to any person requesting such record after deletion of the portions which are exempt. . . ." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (1982). Our review of the documents (both redacted and unredacted) found that the IG did release all reasonably segregable, factual, non-exempt material (e.g., document titles, factual narrative). Therefore, we find that the IG properly disclosed the non-exempt, reasonably segregable portions of the responsive material to Isbill.

It Is Therefore Ordered That:

(1) The Appeal filed by Frank Isbill on May 28, 1999, OHA Case No. VFA-0499, is hereby denied.

(2) This is a final order of the Department of Energy of which any aggrieved party may seek judicial review pursuant to the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(4)(B). Judicial review may be sought in the district in which the requester resides or has a principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, or in the District of Columbia.

(1)The IG did not release 35 of the 74 responsive documents to Isbill because those documents were either written by him or addressed to him. Letter from IG to Isbill, February 25, 1999 (Determination Letter).

(2)Document 68 was withheld in its entirety pursuant to Exemptions 6, 7(C), and 7(D). Later, Isbill received unredacted copies of Documents 24, 53, and 54 in June 1999 for his use as the complainant in a Part 708 proceeding under the DOE Contractor Employee Protection Program. See Memorandum of Telephone Conversation between Jackie Becker, IG, and Valerie Vance Adeyeye, OHA Staff Attorney (June 18, 1999).

(3)The applicability of Exemption 7(D) is based on the circumstances under which the exemption is provided (i.e., granting confidentiality to a source), and not exclusively on the harm resulting from disclosure, as with Exemptions 6 and 7(C). Therefore, there is no balancing test applied under Exemption 7(D). See Jones v. F.B.I., 41 F.3d 238, 247 (6th Cir. 1994) (stating that if the source was confidential, the exemption may be claimed regardless of the public interest in disclosure); Parker v. Department of Justice, 934 F.2d 375, 380 (D.C. Cir. 1991).

Case No. VFA-0500, 27 DOE ¶ 80,213

June 30, 1999

DECISION AND ORDER

OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Appeal

Name of Petitioner: STAND of Amarillo, Inc.

Date of Filing: June 3, 1999

Case Number: VFA-0500

On June 3, 1999, STAND of Amarillo, Inc. (STAND), filed an Appeal from a determination issued by the Department of Energy's Rocky Flats Field Office (DOE/RF). The determination responded to a request for information filed under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), 5 U.S.C. § 552, as implemented by the Department of Energy (DOE) in 10 C.F.R. Part 1004.

The FOIA generally requires that documents held by the federal government be released to the public upon request. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(A). However, Congress has provided nine exemptions to the FOIA setting forth the types of information agencies are not required to release. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(B). Under the DOE's regulations, a document exempt from disclosure under the FOIA shall nonetheless be released to the public whenever the DOE determines that disclosure is not contrary to federal law and in the public interest. 10 C.F.R. § 1004.1.
