General Comment

As a native of Los Cabos, Baja California Sur, Mexico, I can say that whales and the unique ecosystem of our peninsula are far more than just tourist attractions — they are national treasures and an essential part of who we are. These majestic animals and the vibrant marine environment they depend on are deeply woven into our culture, economy, and daily life. Their presence supports local livelihoods, inspires scientific research, and strengthens our connection to the natural world. To protect them is to protect our community's future — ensuring that generations to come can continue to witness their beauty and understand the profound value of preserving our planet's most extraordinary life forms.
