General Comment

Public Comment Opposing the Saguaro Project

I strongly oppose the Saguaro Project due to its harmful impact on the environment and the unique ecosystems of the region. This project poses a serious threat to fragile desert habitats that support a rich biodiversity, including endangered and endemic species native to the U.S. Southwest.

If approved, the project would result in habitat loss and fragmentation, disrupting critical wildlife corridors and placing additional pressure on vulnerable species such as the Sonoran pronghorn, the Mexican spotted owl, and the lesser long-nosed bat. These ecosystems are already under stress from climate change and prolonged droughts.

Furthermore, the project could alter natural water flows and deplete groundwater reserves that are essential for both wildlife and nearby communities. Such environmental degradation is not only irreversible but also short-sighted in the context of an escalating climate crisis that demands greater conservation efforts—not further destruction.

I urge decision-makers to reject the Saguaro Project and to prioritize more sustainable, ecologically responsible alternatives. Our natural heritage and the future of our ecosystems must come before industrial development.
