General Comment

The Saguaro project raises serious concerns regarding its environmental and social feasibility. Although construction has not yet begun, it has already negatively impacted local communities and ecosystems. The potential harm to marine life—particularly whales, which are vital to the region's biodiversity and ecotourism—cannot be overlooked. Additionally, such a development threatens the ecological balance and appeal of Los Cabos, one of Mexico's most exclusive and attractive destinations for international visitors. Given the significant environmental risks and community disruption, this project appears neither sustainable nor viable.
