

Better Buildings Residential Network (BBRN) members must be supportive of residential energy efficiency and the mission of the BBRN.

Members are expected to be legally incorporated organizations or institutions, rather than individuals, actively engaged in the field of existing residential building energy efficiency with an ability to impact the market.

Members should have the ability and capacity to carry out the requirements for membership (i.e., reporting the annual number of upgrades in their sphere of influence, and associated benefits), and actively engage as a member.

Members must actively engage in significant work supporting, studying, researching, reporting, and/or practicing residential building energy efficiency, and demonstrate the ability to abide by the BBRN Code of Conduct in order to become members.

Prospective members must complete a membership form, and be prepared to provide additional information about professional activities and experiences if requested.

Organizations may only sign up for themselves, not on behalf of other organizations.

If an institution is sanctioned by a governmental agency or judicial body for violating laws or regulations affecting their professional activities, their membership may be terminated.

If an organization fails to carry out the requirements for membership (i.e., reporting the annual number of upgrades in their sphere of influence, and associated benefits), does not actively engage as a member, or violates the BBRN Code of Conduct, their membership may be terminated.

Membership is subject to review and revocation by the U.S. Department of Energy or the member organization at any time.
